TO THE MEMORY

OF

THE REVEREND HERBERT HILL,

Formerly Student of Christ Church, Oxford: successively Chaplain to the British Factories at Porto and at Lisbon; and late Rector of Streatham; who was released from this life, Sept. 19, 1828, in the 80th year of his age.

---

Not upon marble or sepulchral brass
Have I the record of thy worth inscribed,
Dear Uncle! nor from Chantrey's chisel ask'd
A monumental statue, which might wear
Thro' many an age thy venerable form.
Such tribute, were I rich in this world's wealth,
Should rightfully be rendered, in discharge
Of grateful duty, to the world evinced
When testifying so by outward sign
Its deep and inmost sense. But what I can
Is rendered piously, prefixing here
Thy perfect lineaments, two centuries
Before thy birth by Holbein's happy hand
Prefigured thus. It is the portraiture

Of More the mild, the learned, and the good ;
Traced in that better stage of human life,
When vain imaginations, troublous thoughts,
And hopes and fears have had their course, and left
The intellect composed, the heart at rest,
Nor yet decay hath touch'd our mortal frame.
Such was the man whom Henry, of desert
Appreciant alway, chose for highest trust ;
Whom England in that eminence approved ;
Whom Europe honoured, and Erasmus loved.
Such he was ere heart-hardening bigotry
Obscured his spirit, made him with himself
Discordant, and, contracting then his brow,
With sour defeature marr'd his countenance.
What he was, in his best and happiest time,
Even such wert thou, dear Uncle ! such thy look Benign and thoughtful ; such thy placid mien ;
Thine eye serene, significant and strong,
Bright in its quietness, yet brightening oft
With quick emotion of benevolence,
Or flash of active fancy, and that mirth
Which aye with sober wisdom well accords.
Nor ever did true Nature, with more nice
Exactitude, fit to the inner man
The fleshly mould, than when she stamp't on thine
Her best credentials, and bestowed on thee

An aspect, to whose sure benignity
Beasts with instinctive confidence could trust,
Which at a glance obtained respect from men,
And won at once good will from all the good.

Such as in semblance, such in word and deed
Lisbon beheld him, when for many a year
The even tenour of his spotless life
Adorn'd the English Church, . . her minister
In that strong hold of Rome's Idolatry,
To God and man approved. What Englishman,
Who in those peaceful days of Portugal
Resorted thither, curious to observe
Her cities, and the works and ways of men,
But sought him, and from his abundant stores
Of knowledge profited? What stricken one,
Sent thither to protract a living death,
Forlorn perhaps, and friendless else, but found
A friend in him? What mourners, . . who had seen
The object of their agonizing hopes
In that sad cypress ground deposited,
Wherein so many a flower of British growth,
Untimely faded and cut down, is laid,
In foreign earth compress'd, . . but bore away
A life-long sense of his compassionate care,
His Christian goodness? Faithful shepherd he,

And vigilant against the wolves, who there,
If entrance might be won, would straight beset
The dying stranger, and with merciless zeal
Bay the death-bed ! In every family
Throughout his fold was he the welcome guest,
Alike to every generation dear,
The children's favourite, and the grandsire's friend,
Tried, trusted and beloved. So liberal too
In secret alms, even to his utmost means,
That they who served him, and who saw in part
The channels where his constant bounty ran,
Maugre their own uncharitable faith,
Believed him, for his works, secure of Heaven.

It would have been a grief for me to think
The features, which so perfectly express'd
That excellent mind, should irretrievably
From earth have past away, existing now
Only in some few faithful memories
Insoul'd, and not by any limner's skill
To be imbodied thence. A blessing then
On him, in whose prophetic counterfeit
Preserved, the children now, who were the crown
Of his old age, may see their father's face,
Here to the very life pourtray'd, as when Spain's mountain passes, and her ilex woods,

And fragrant wildernesses, side by side,
With him I traversed, in my morn of youth,
And gathered knowledge from his full discourse.
Often in former years I pointed out,
Well-pleased, the casual portrait, which so well
Assorted in all points; and haply since,
While lingering o'er this meditative work,
Sometimes that likeness, not unconsciously,
Hath tinged the strain; and therefore, for the sake
Of this resemblance, are these volumes now
Thus to his memory properly inscribed.

O Friend! O more than father! whom I found Forbearing alway, alway kind; to whom
No gratitude can speak the debt I owe;
Far on their earthly pilgrimage advanced
Are they who knew thee when we drew the breath
Of that delicious clime! The most are gone;
And whoso yet survive of those who then
Were in their summer season; on the tree
Of life hang here and there like wintry leaves,
Which the first breeze will from the bough bring down.
I, too, am in the sear, the yellow leaf.
And yet, (no wish is nearer to my heart,)
One arduous labour more; as unto thee
In duty bound, full fain would I complete,

(So Heaven permit,) recording faithfully
The heroic rise, the glories, the decline,
Of that fallen country, dear to us, wherein
The better portion of thy days was past;
And where, in fruitful intercourse with thee,
My intellectual life received betimes
The bias it hath kept. Poor Portugal,
In us thou harbouredst no ungrateful guests!
We loved thee well; mother magnanimous
Of mighty intellects and faithful hearts, . .
For such in other times thou wert, nor yet
To be despair'd of, for not yet, methinks,
Degenerate wholly, . . yes, we loved thee well!
And in thy moving story, (so but life
Be given me to mature the gathered store
Of thirty years,) poet, and politick,
And Christian sage (only philosopher
Who from the Well of living water drinks
Never to thirst again), shall find, I ween,
For fancy, and for profitable thought,
Abundant food.

Alas! should this be given,
Such consummation of my work will now
Be but a mournful close, the one being gone,
Whom to have satisfied was still to me
A pure reward, outweighing far all breath

Of public praise. O friend revered, O guide
And fellow-labourer in this ample field,
How large a portion of myself hath past
With thee, from earth to Heaven! . . Thus they who reach Grey hairs, die piecemeal. But in good old age
Thou hast departed; not to be bewailed, . .
Oh no! The promise on the Mount vouchsafed,
Nor abrogate by any later law
Reveal'd to man, . . that promise, as by thee
Full piously deserved, was faithfully
In thee fulfill'd, and in the land thy days
Were long. I would not, as I saw thee last,
For a king's ransom, have detain'd thee here, . .
Bent, like the antique sculptor's limbless trunk,
By chronic pain, yet with thine eye unquench'd,
The ear undimm'd, the mind retentive still,
The heart unchanged, the intellectual lamp
Burning in its corporeal sepulchre!
No; not if human wishes had had power
To have suspended Nature's constant work,
Would they who loved thee have detained thee thus,
Waiting for death.

That trance is over. Thou
Art entered on thy heavenly heritage;
And I, whose dial of mortality
Points to the eleventh hour, shall follow soon.

Meantime, with dutiful and patient hope,
I labour that our names conjoin'd may long Survive, in honour one day to be held
Where old Lisboa from her hills o'erlooks
Expanded Tagus, with its populous shores
And pine woods, to Palmella's crested height :
Nor there alone ; but in those rising realms
Where now the offsets of the Lusian tree
Push forth their vigorous shoots, . . from central plains,
Whence rivers flow divergent, to the gulph
Southward where wild Parana disembogues.
A sea-like stream ; and northward in a world
Of forests, where huge Orellana clips
His thousand islands with his thousand arms.

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

PREFACE.

---

THIS book originated in the train of thought described in the introductory pages, and was begun at the time there specified. For the form which it has taken I am indebted to Boethius; an obligation which perhaps few readers would have suspected, but which I am not the less bound to acknowledge. Farther than this it is only necessary to say, that recent circumstances have produced no change in the author concerning the Roman Catholic Question: no one however can more sincerely wish that timid councils may be proved by the event to have been wise ones; that government may gain strength by yielding to menaces; and that the Protestant Constitution of these kingdoms may be secured by abandoning the principles upon which it was established.

And here this Preface would have ended, if a certain Rev. Mr. Shannon, who was three or four times in company with me, three or four and twenty years ago, had not thought proper to affirm in a recent pamphlet, that Mr. Southey expressed to him, at that time, 'ardent wishes' for the restoration of what he calls 'the Catholic rights;' and to assert that such wishes could not possibly have been changed, except from 'causes that are liable to suspicion.' It is so utterly insignificant what opinions any individual may have advanced upon such a topic, long ago, in the freedom of conversation, at a private table, that I should not think it worth while to bestow any public notice upon such a statement, still less upon the insinuation which accompanies it, were there not persons in whom party spirit has so far destroyed the sense of honour and of justice, that any authority however futile is sufficient for them, when the purpose of detraction is to be served by it. But these 'ardent wishes,' and the energy of language in which Mr. Shannon pretends to remember that they were expressed, never had, or could have had any existence, except in the dreams of his own imagination. For it is well known to every one of my early friends, (and few men, as they pass through life, have dropt fewer of their friendships on the way,) that my opinions respecting the Roman Catholic claims to seats in Parliament and certain offices in the state have always been the same. I have ever maintained that the Romanists ought to be admitted to every office of trust, honour, or emolument, which is not connected with legislative power; but that it is against the plainest rules of policy to entrust men with power in the State whose bounden religious duty it is to subvert, if they can, the Church. These opinions I have uniformly held since the question was brought forward in the first year of the present century; and in these (with leave of Sir James Graham) I expect to continue for the short remainder of my life; . . . unless that honourable and courteous Baronet, who represents the county of Cumberland, and misrepresents me, should lay before the world such arguments, deduced from his own researches and experience, that I must be enforced in reason and in conscience to submit to them and acknowledge my conviction accordingly.

..Of the wrongs and sufferings of the Irish people, (which is altogether a different question,) of the condition to which their landlords, their middlemen and their priests have reduced them, and the state of barbarism in which the British Government, by the grossest neglect of its paramount duty, has suffered them to remain, I have at all times felt, and spoken, as a man who abhors oppression, and earnestly wishes for every possible improvement in the spiritual and temporal condition of his fellow-creatures.

Having thus given the most direct contradiction to Mr. Shannon's assertions, I leave him to reconcile his conduct on this occasion with the principles by which our intercourse in society is usually supposed to be regulated, and his insinuations with the charity which as a minister of the Gospel he ought better to have understood and to have practised.

COLLOQUY I.
THE INTRODUCTION.

*Posso aver certezza, e non paura,
Che raccontando quel che m' è accaduto,
Il ver dirò, nè mi sarà creduto.*

Orlando Innamorato, c. 5. st. 53.

It was during that melancholy November, when the death of the Princess Charlotte had diffused throughout Great Britain a more general sorrow than had ever before been known in these kingdoms; I was sitting alone, at evening, in my library, and my thoughts had wandered, from the book before me, to the circumstances which made this national calamity be felt almost like a private affliction. While I was thus musing, the post-woman arrived. My letters told me there was nothing exaggerated in the public accounts of the impression which this sudden loss had produced: that wherever you went, you found the women of the family weeping, and that men could scarcely speak of the event without tears: that in all the better parts of the metropolis, there was a sort of palsied feeling which seemed to affect the whole current of active life; and that for several days there prevailed in the streets a stillness like that of the Sabbath, but without its repose. I opened the newspaper; it was still bordered with broad mourning lines, and was filled with details concerning the deceased Princess. Her coffin and the ceremonies at her funeral were described as minutely as the order of her nuptials and her bridal dress had been, in the same journal, scarce eighteen months before. ‘Man,’ says Sir Thomas Brown, ‘is a noble animal, ‘splendid in ashes, and pompous in the grave; ‘solemnizing nativities and deaths with equal ‘lustre, nor omitting ceremonies of bravery in ‘the infamy of his nature.’ These things led me in spirit to the vault, and I thought of the memorable dead among whom her mortal remains were now deposited. Possessed with such imaginations, I leaned back upon the sofa and closed my eyes.

Ere long I was awakened from that conscious state of slumber in which the stream of fancy floweth as it listeth, by the entrance of an elderly personage, of grave and dignified appearance. His countenance and manner were remarkably benign, and announced a high degree of intellectual rank, and he accosted me in a voice of uncommon sweetness, saying, Montesinos, a stranger from a distant country may intrude upon you without those credentials which in other cases you have a right to require. From America? I replied, rising to salute him. Some of the most gratifying visits which I have ever received, have been from that part of the world. It gives me indeed more pleasure than I can express, to welcome such travellers as have sometimes found their way from New England to these lakes and mountains; men who have not forgotten what they owe to their ancient mother; whose principles, and talents, and attainments, would render them an ornament to any country, and might almost lead me to hope that their republican constitution may be more permanent, than all other considerations would induce me either to suppose or wish.

You judge of me, he made answer, by my speech. I am, however, English by birth, and come now from a more distant country than America, wherein I have long been naturalized. Without explaining himself further, or allowing me time to make the inquiry which would naturally have followed, he asked me, if I were not thinking of the Princess Charlotte, when he disturbed me. That, said I, may easily be divined. All persons whose hearts are not filled with their own grief, are thinking of her at this time. It had just occurred to me, that on two former occasions, when the heir-apparent of England was cut off in the prime of life, the nation was on the eve of a religious revolution in the first instance, and of a political one in the second.

Prince Arthur and Prince Henry, he replied. Do you notice this as ominous, or merely as remarkable ?

Merely as remarkable, was my answer. Yet there are certain moods of mind, in which we can scarcely help ascribing an ominous importance to any remarkable coincidence, wherein things of moment are concerned.

Are you superstitious ? said he. Understand me as using the word, for want of a more appropriate one ; not in its ordinary and contemptuous acceptance.

I smiled at the question, and replied, many persons would apply the epithet to me without qualifying it. This, you know, is the age of reason, and during the last hundred and fifty years, men have been reasoning themselves out of every thing that they ought to believe and feel. Among a certain miserable class who are more numerous than is commonly supposed, he who believes in a First Cause, and a future state, is regarded with contempt as a superstitionist. The religious Naturalist in his turn despises the feeble mind of the Socinian ; and the Socinian looks with astonishment or pity at the weakness of those, who, having by conscientious inquiry satisfied themselves of the authenticity of the Scriptures, are contented to believe what is written, and acknowledge humility to be the foundation of wisdom as well as of virtue. But for myself, many, if not most of those even who agree with me in all essential points, would be inclined to think me superstitious, because I am not ashamed to avow my persuasion that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in their philosophy.

You believe then in apparitions, said my visitor.

MONTESINOS.

Even so, Sir. That such things should be, is probable à priori ; and I cannot refuse assent to the strong evidence that such* things are, nor to the common consent which has prevailed among all people, every where, in all ages ; a belief indeed which is truly catholic, in the widest acceptation of the word. I am, by in-

* Concerning one of these stories, Boswell relates the following conversation. Johnson had been saying, that Wesley could talk well on any subject. BOSWELL. Pray, Sir, what has he made of his story of a ghost? JOHNSON. Why, Sir, he believes it, but not on sufficient evidence. He did not take time enough to examine the girl. It was at Newcastle, where the ghost was said to have appeared to a young woman several times, mentioning something about the right to an old house, advising application to be made to an attorney, which was done ; and at the same time saying the attorney would do nothing, which proved to be the fact. This, says John, is a proof that a ghost knows our thoughts. Now (laughing) it is not necessary to know our thoughts to tell that an attorney will sometimes do nothing. Charles Wesley, who is a more stationary man, does not believe the story. I am sorry that John did not take more pains to inquire into the evidence for it. MISS SEWARD (with an incredulous smile) What, Sir ! about a ghost? JOHNSON (with solemn vehemence) Yes, Madam : this is a question which, after five thousand years, is yet undecided ; a question, whether in theology or philosophy, one of the most important that can come before the human understanding.

quiry and conviction, as well as by inclination and feeling, a Christian ; life would be intolerable to me if I were not so. But, says Saint-Evremont, ‘ the most devout cannot always command their belief, nor the most impious their incredulity.’ I acknowledge with Sir Thomas Brown, that ‘ as in philosophy, so in divinity, there are sturdy doubts and boisterous objections, wherewith the unhappiness of our knowledge too nearly acquainteth us ;’ and I confess with him that these are to be conquered, ‘ not in a martial posture, but on our knees.’ If then there are moments wherein I, who have satisfied my reason, and possess a firm and assured faith, feel that I have in this opinion a strong hold, . . I cannot but perceive that they who have endeavoured to dispossess the people of their old instinctive belief in such things, have done little service to individuals, and much injury to the community.

STRANGER.

Do you extend this to a belief in witchcraft ?

MONTESINOS.

The common stories of witchcraft confute themselves, as may be seen in all the trials for that offence. Upon this subject I would say with my old friend Charles Lamb,

I do not love to credit tales of magic !
Heaven's music, which is order, seems unstrung,
And this brave world
(The mystery of God) unbeautified,
Disorder'd, marr'd, where such strange things are acted.

The only inference which can be drawn from the confession of some of the poor wretches who have suffered upon such charges, is, that they had attempted to commit the crime, and thereby incurred the guilt and deserved the punishment*. Of this indeed there have been recent instances; and in one atrocious case, the criminal escaped, because the statute against the imaginary offence is obsolete, and there exists no law which could reach the real one.

STRANGER.

He who may wish to show with what absurd perversion the forms and technicalities of law are applied to obstruct the purposes of justice, which they were designed to further, may find excellent examples in England. But leaving this, allow me to ask whether you think all the stories which are related of an intercourse between men and beings of a superior order, good or evil, are to be disbelieved like the vulgar tales of witchcraft?

MONTESINOS.

If you happen, Sir, to have read some of those ballads which I threw off in the high spirits of youth, you may judge what my opinion then was of the grotesque demonology of the monks and middle ages, by the use there made of it. But in the scale of existences there may be as many orders above us, as below. We know there are creatures so minute, that without the aid of our glasses they could never have been discovered; and this fact, if it were not notorious as well as certain, would appear not less incredible to sceptical minds than that there should be beings which are invisible to us because of their subtlety. That there are such, I am as little able to doubt, as I am to affirm anything concerning them; but if there are such, why not evil spirits, as well as wicked men? Many travellers who have been conversant with savages have been fully persuaded that their jugglers actually possessed some means of communication with the invisible world, and exercised a supernatural power which they derived from it. And not missionaries only have believed this, and old travellers who lived in ages of credulity, but more recent observers, such as Carver and Bruce, whose testimony is of great weight, and who were neither ignorant, nor weak, nor credulous men. What I have read concerning ordeals, also staggers me; and I am sometimes inclined to think it more possible, that when there has been full faith on all sides, these appeals to divine justice may have been answered by Him who sees the secrets of all hearts, than that modes of trial should have prevailed so long and so generally, from some of which no person could ever have escaped without an interposition of Providence*. Thus it has appeared to me in my calm and unbiassed judgment. Yet I confess I should want faith to make the trial. May it not be, that by such means in dark ages, and among blind nations, the purpose is effected of preserving conscience and the belief of our immortality, without which the life of our life would be extinct? And with regard to the conjurers of the African and

* The Rocking Stone placed the decision entirely in the power of the priests; but the ordeal of boiling water, or boiling oil, and some of those in which red hot iron was used, left no means of escape by contrivance, and no possibility of escaping by chance. I think it is Forbes (in his Oriental Memoirs) who mentions a remarkable case at which he was present himself, and where there could have been no collusion.

American savages, would it be unreasonable to suppose that, as the most elevated devotion brings us into fellowship with the Holy Spirit, a correspondent degree of wickedness may effect a communion with evil Intelligences? These are mere speculations, which I advance for as little as they are worth. My serious belief amounts to this, that preternatural impressions are sometimes communicated to us for wise purposes; and that departed spirits are sometimes permitted to manifest themselves.

STRANGER.

If a ghost then were disposed to pay you a visit, you would be in a proper state of mind for receiving such a visitor?

MONTESINOS.

I should not credit my senses lightly; neither should I obstinately distrust them, after I had put the reality of the appearance to the proof, as far as that were possible.

STRANGER.

Should you like to have an opportunity afforded you?

MONTESINOS.

Heaven forbid! I have suffered so much in dreams from conversing with those whom even in sleep I knew to be departed, that an actual presence might perhaps be more than I could bear.

STRANGER.

But if it were the spirit of one with whom you had no near ties of relationship, or love, how then would it affect you?

MONTESINOS.

That would of course be according to the circumstances on both sides. But I entreat you not to imagine that I am any way desirous of enduring the experiment.

STRANGER.

Suppose, for example, he were to present himself as I have done; the purport of his coming friendly; the place and opportunity suiting, as at present; the time also considerably chosen...after dinner; and the spirit not more abrupt in his appearance, not more formidable in aspect than the being who now addresses you?

MONTESINOS.

Why, Sir, to so substantial a ghost, and of such respectable appearance, I might, perhaps, have courage enough to say with Hamlet,

Thou comest in such a questionable shape,
That I will speak to thee!

STRANGER.

Then, Sir, let me introduce myself in that character, now that our conversation has conducted us so happily to the point. I told you truly that I was English by birth, but that I came from a more distant country than America, and had long been naturalized there. The country whence I come is not the New World, but the other one : and I now declare myself in sober earnest to be a Ghost.

MONTESINOS.

A Ghost !

STRANGER.

A veritable Ghost, and an honest one, who went out of the world with so good a character, that he will hardly escape canonization if ever you get a Roman Catholic king upon the throne. And now what test do you require ?

MONTESINOS.

I can detect no smell of brimstone ; and the candle burns as it did before, without the slightest tinge of blue in its flame. You look, indeed, like a spirit of health, and I might be disposed to give entire belief to that countenance, if it were not for the tongue that belongs to it. But you are a queer spirit, whether good or evil.

STRANGER.

The headsman thought so, when he made a ghost of me almost three hundred years ago.

I had the character through life of loving a jest, and did not belie it at the last. But I had also as general a reputation for sincerity, and of that also conclusive proof was given at the same time. In serious truth, then, I am a disembodied spirit, and the form in which I now manifest myself is subject to none of the accidents of matter... You are still incredulous!.. Feel, then, and be convinced!

My incomprehensible guest extended his hand toward me as he spake. I held forth mine to accept it, not, indeed, believing him, and yet not altogether without some apprehensive emotion, as if I were about to receive an electrical shock. The effect was more startling than electricity would have produced. His hand had neither weight nor substance; my fingers, when they would have closed upon it, found nothing that they could grasp: it was intangible, though it had all the reality of form.

In the name of God, I exclaimed, who are you, and wherefore are you come?

Be not alarmed, he replied. Your reason, which has shown you the possibility of such an appearance as you now witness, must have convinced you also that it would never be permitted for an evil end. Examine my features well, and see if you do not recognize them. Hans Holbein was excellent at a likeness.

I had now, for the first time in my life, a distinct sense of that sort of porcupinish motion over the whole scalp which is so frequently described by the Latin poets. It was considerably allayed by the benignity of his countenance and the manner of his speech, and after looking him steadily in the face I ventured to say, for the likeness had previously struck me, Is it Sir Thomas More? The same: he made answer; and lifting up his chin, displayed a circle round the neck brighter in colour than the ruby. The marks of martyrdom, he continued, are our insignia of honour. Fisher and I have the purple collar, as Friar Forrest and Cranmer have the robe of fire.

A mingled feeling of fear and veneration kept me silent, till I perceived by his look that he expected and encouraged me to speak: and collecting my spirits as well as I could, I asked him wherefore he had thought proper to appear, and why to me rather than to any other person?

He replied, we reap as we have sown. Men bear with them from this world into the intermediate state their habits of mind and stores of knowledge, their dispositions and affections and desires; and these become a part of our punishment, or of our reward, according to their kind. Those persons, therefore, in whom the virtue of patriotism has predominated, continue to regard with interest their native land, unless it be so utterly sunk in degradation that the moral relationship between them is dissolved. Epaminondas can have no sympathy at this time with Thebes, nor Cicero with Rome, nor Belisarius with the imperial city of the East. But the worthies of England retain their affection for their noble country, behold its advancement with joy, and when serious danger appears to threaten the goodly structure of its institutions, they feel as much anxiety as is compatible with their state of beatitude.

MONTESINOS.

What, then, may doubt and anxiety consist with the happiness of heaven?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Heaven and hell may be said to begin on your side the grave. In the intermediate state conscience anticipates with unerring certainty the result of judgement. We, therefore, who have done well, can have no fear for ourselves. But inasmuch as the world has any hold upon our affections, we are liable to that anxiety which is inseparable from terrestrial hopes. And as parents who are in bliss regard still with parental love the children whom they have left on earth, we, in like manner, though with a feeling different in kind and inferior in degree, look with apprehension upon the perils of our country.

————— sub pectore forti
Vivit adhuc patriæ pietas ; stimulatque sepultum
Libertatis amor : pondus mortale necari
Si potuit, veteres animo post funera vires
Mansere, et prisci vivit non immemor ævi.

They are the words of old Mantuan.

MONTESINOS.

I am to understand then that you cannot see into the ways of futurity.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Enlarged as our faculties are, you must not suppose that we partake of prescience. For human actions are free, and we exist in time. The future is to us therefore as uncertain as to you ; except, only, that having a clearer and more comprehensive knowledge of the past, we are enabled to reason better from causes to consequences, and by what has been, to judge of what is likely to be. We have this advantage also, that we are divested of all those passions which cloud the intellects and warp the understandings of men. . . You are thinking, I perceive, how much you have to learn, and what you should first inquire of me. But expect no revelations! Enough was revealed when man was assured of judgement after death, and the means of salvation were afforded him. I neither come to discover secret things nor hidden treasures; but to discourse with you concerning these portentous and monster-breeding times; for it is your lot, as it was mine, to live during one of the grand climacterics of the world. And I come to you, rather than to any other person, because you have been led to meditate upon the corresponding changes whereby your age and mine are distinguished; and because, notwithstanding many discrepancies and some dispathies between us, (speaking of myself as I was, and as you know me,) there are certain points of sympathy and resemblance which bring us into contact, and enable us at once to understand each other.

MONTESINOS.

Et in Utopiâ ego.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You apprehend me. We have both speculated in the joy and freedom of our youth upon the possible improvement of society; and both in like manner have lived to dread with reason the effects of that restless spirit, which, like the Titaness Mutability described by your immortal master, insults Heaven and disturbs the earth. By comparing the great operating causes in the age of the Reformation, and in this age of revolutions, going back to the former age, looking at things as I then beheld them, perceiving wherein I judged rightly, and wherein I erred, and tracing the progress of those causes which are now developing their whole tremendous power, you will derive instruction, which you are a fit person to receive and communicate; for without being solicitous concerning present effect, you are contented to cast your bread upon the waters. You are now acquainted with me and my intention. To-morrow you will see me again; and I shall continue to visit you occasionally as opportunity may serve. Meantime say nothing of what has passed,—not even to your wife. She might not like the thoughts of a ghostly visitor; and the reputation of conversing with the dead might be almost as inconvenient as that of dealing with the Devil. For the present then, farewell! I will never startle you with too sudden an apparition; but you may learn to behold my disappearance without alarm.

I was not able to behold it without emotion, although he had thus prepared me: for the sentence was no sooner completed than he was gone. Instead of rising from the chair, he vanished from it. I know not to what the instantaneous disappearance can be likened. Not to the dissolution of a rainbow, because the colours of the rainbow fade gradually till they are lost; not to the flash of cannon, or to lightning, for these things are gone as soon as they are come, and it is known that the instant of their appearance must be that of their departure; not to a bubble upon the water, for you see it burst; not to the sudden extinction of a light, for that is either succeeded by darkness, or leaves a different hue upon the surrounding objects. In the same indivisible point of time when I beheld the distinct, individual, and, to all sense of sight, substantial form,—the living, moving, reasonable image,—in that self-same instant it was gone, as if exemplifying the difference between to be and not to be. It was no dream, of this I was well assured:

realities are never mistaken for dreams, though dreams may be mistaken for realities. Moreover I had long been accustomed in sleep to question my perceptions with a wakeful faculty of reason, and to detect their fallacy. But, as well may be supposed, my thoughts that night, sleeping as well as waking, were filled with this extraordinary interview; and when I arose the next morning, it was not till I had called to mind every circumstance of time and place that I was convinced the apparition was real, and that I might again expect it.

COLLOQUY II.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF THE WORLD.

ON the following evening, when my spiritual visitor entered the room, that volume of Dr. Wordsworth's Ecclesiastical Biography, which contains his life, was lying on the table beside me. 'I perceive,' said he, glancing at the book, 'you have been gathering all you can 'concerning me from my good gossiping chronicler, who tells you that I loved milk and fruit 'and eggs, preferred beef to young meats, and 'brown bread to white; was fond of seeing 'strange birds and beasts, and kept an ape, a 'fox, a weasel, and a ferret.'

I am not one of those fastidious readers, I replied, who quarrel with a writer for telling them too much. But these things were worth telling: they show that you retained a youthful palate as well as a youthful heart; and I like you the better both for your diet and your menagerie. The old biographer, indeed, with the best intentions, has been far from understanding the character which he desired to honour. He seems, however, to have been a faithful reporter, and has done as well as his capacity permitted. I observe that he gives you credit for 'a deep foresight and judgement of the times,' and for speaking in a prophetic spirit of the evils which soon afterwards were 'full heavily felt.'

There could be little need for a spirit of prophecy, Sir Thomas made answer, to foresee troubles which were the sure effect of the causes then in operation, and which were actually close at hand. When the rain is gathering from the south or west, and those flowers and herbs which serve as natural hygrometers close their leaves, men have no occasion to consult the stars for what the clouds and the earth are telling them. You were thinking of Prince Arthur when I introduced myself yesterday, as if musing upon the great events which seemed to have received their bias from the apparent accident of his premature death.

MONTESINOS:

I had fallen into one of those idle reveries in which we speculate upon what might have been. Lord Bacon describes him as 'very studious,

‘and learned beyond his years, and beyond the custom of great princes.’ As this indicates a calm and thoughtful mind, it seems to show that he inherited the Tudor character. His brother took after the Plantagenets; but it was not of their nobler qualities that he partook. He had the popular manners of his grandfather, Edward IV., and, like him, was lustful, cruel, and unfeeling.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The blood of the Plantagenets, as your friends the Spaniards would say, was a strong blood. That temper of mind which (in some of his predecessors) thought so little of fratricide, might perhaps have involved him in the guilt of a parricidal war, if his father had not been fortunate enough to escape such an affliction by a timely death. We might otherwise be allowed to wish that the life of Henry VII. had been prolonged to a good old age. For if ever there was a prince who could so have directed the Reformation as to have averted the evils wherewith that tremendous event was accompanied, and yet to have secured its advantages, he was the man. Cool, wary, far-sighted, rapacious, politic, and religious,—or superstitious if you will, (for his religion had its root rather in fear than in hope,) he was peculiarly adapted for such a crisis both by his good and evil qualities. For the sake of increasing his treasures and his power, he would have promoted the Reformation; but his cautious temper, his sagacity, and his fear of divine justice would have taught him where to stop.

MONTESINOS.

A generation of politic sovereigns succeeded to the race of warlike ones, just in that age of society when policy became of more importance in their station than military talents. Ferdinand of Spain, Joam II., whom the Portuguese called the Perfect Prince, Louis XI., and Henry VII. were all of this class. Their individual characters were sufficiently distinct; but the circumstances of their situation stamp them with a marked resemblance, and they were of a metal to take and retain the strong, sharp impress of the age.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The age required such characters; and it is worthy of notice how surely in the order of Providence such men as are wanted are raised up. One generation of these Princes sufficed. In Spain, indeed, there was an exception; for Ferdinand had two successors who pursued the same course of conduct. In the other kingdoms the character ceased with the necessity for it. Crimes enough were committed by succeeding sovereigns, but they were no longer the acts of systematic and reflecting policy. This too is worthy of remark, that the sovereigns whom you have named, and who scrupled at no means for securing themselves on the throne, for enlarging their dominions and consolidating their power, were each severally made to feel the vanity of human ambition, being punished either in or by the children who were to reap the advantage of their crimes. ' Verily there is a God that judgeth the earth !'

MONTESINOS.

An excellent friend of mine, one of the wisest, best, and happiest men whom I have ever known, delights in this manner to trace the moral order of Providence through the revolutions of the world ; and in his historical writings keeps it in view as the pole-star of his course. I wish he were present, that he might have the satisfaction of hearing his favourite opinion confirmed by one from the dead.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

His opinion requires no other confirmation than what he finds for it in observation and scripture, and in his own calm judgement. I should differ little from that friend of yours concerning the past ; but his hopes for the future appear to me like early buds which are in danger of March winds. He believes the world to be in a rapid state of sure improvement; and in the ferment which exists every where he beholds only a purifying process; not considering that there is an acetous, as well as a vinous fermentation; and that in the one case the liquor may be spilt, in the other it must be spoilt.

MONTESINOS.

Surely you would not rob us of our hopes for the human race! If I apprehended that your discourse tended to this end, I should suspect you, notwithstanding your appearance, and be ready to exclaim, Avaunt, Tempter! For there is no opinion from which I should so hardly be driven, and so reluctantly part, as the belief that the world will continue to improve, even as it has hitherto continually been improving; and that the progress of knowledge and the diffusion of Christianity will bring about at last, when men become Christians in reality, as well as in name, something like that Utopian state of which philosophers have loved to dream, . . . like that millennium in which Saints as well as enthusiasts have trusted.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Do you hold that this consummation must of necessity come to pass; or that it depends in any degree upon the course of events, that is to say, upon human actions? The former of these propositions you would be as unwilling to admit as your friend Wesley, or the old Welshman Pelagius himself. The latter leaves you little other foundation for your opinion than a desire, which, from its very benevolence, is the more likely to be delusive... You are in a dilemma.

MONTESINOS.

Not so, Sir Thomas. Impossible as it may be for us to reconcile the free will of man with the foreknowledge of God, I nevertheless believe in both with the most full conviction. When the human mind plunges into time and space in its speculations, it adventures beyond its sphere; no wonder, therefore, that its powers fail, and it is lost. But that my will is free, I know feelingly: it is proved to me by my conscience. And that God provideth all things, I know by his own word, and by that instinct which he hath implanted in me to assure me of his being. My answer to your question then is this: I believe that the happy consummation which I desire is appointed, and must come to pass; but that when it is to come depends upon the obedience of man to the will of God, that is, upon human actions.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You hold then that the human race will one day attain the utmost degree of general virtue, and thereby general happiness, of which humanity is capable. Upon what do you found this belief?

MONTESINOS.

The opinion is stated more broadly than I should chuse to advance it. But this is ever the manner of argumentative discourse: the opponent endeavours to draw from you conclusions which you are not prepared to defend, and which perhaps you have never before acknowledged even to yourself. I will put the proposition in a less disputable form. A happier condition of society is possible than that in which any nation is existing at this time, or has at any time existed. The sum both of moral and physical evil may be greatly diminished by good laws, good institutions, and good governments. Moral evil cannot indeed be removed, unless the nature of man were changed; and that renovation is only to be effected in individuals, and in them only by the special grace of God. Physical evil must always, to a certain degree, be inseparable from mortality. But both are so much within the reach of human institutions, that a state of society is conceivable almost as superior to that of England in these days, as that itself is superior to the condition of the tattooed Britons, or of the Northern Pirates from whom we are descended. Surely this belief rests upon a reasonable foundation, and is supported by that general improvement (always going on if it be regarded upon the great scale) to which all history bears witness.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

I dispute not this: but to render it a reasonable ground of immediate hope, the predominance of good principles must be supposed. Do you believe that good or evil principles predominate at this time?

MONTESINOS.

If I were to judge by that expression of popular opinion which the press pretends to convey, I should reply without hesitation that never in any other known age of the world have such pernicious principles been so prevalent.

Qua terra patet, fera regnat Erinny;
In facinus jurasse putes.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Is there not a danger that these principles may bear down every thing before them? and is not that danger obvious, . . . palpable, . . . imminent? Is there a considerate man who can look at the signs of the times without apprehension, or a scoundrel connected with what is called the public press, who does not speculate upon them, and join with the anarchists as the strongest party? Deceive not yourself by the fallacious notion that truth is mightier than falsehood, and that good must prevail over evil! Good principles enable men to suffer, rather than to act. Think how the dog, fond and faithful creature as he is, from being the most docile and obedient of all animals, is made the most dangerous, if he becomes mad; so men acquire a frightful and not less monstrous power when they are in a state of moral insanity, and break loose from their social and religious obligations. Remember too how rapidly the plague of diseased opinions is communicated, and that if it once gain head, it is as difficult to be stopt as a conflagration or a flood. The prevailing opinions of this age go to the destruction of every thing which has hitherto been held sacred. They tend to arm the poor against the rich; the many against the few: worse than this, . . for it will also be a war of hope and enterprise against timidity, of youth against age.

MONTESINOS.

Sir Ghost, you are almost as dreadful an alarmist as our Cumberland cow, who is believed to have lately uttered this prophecy, delivering it with oracular propriety in verse :

Two winters, a wet spring,
A bloody summer, and no king.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

That prophecy speaks the wishes of the man, whoever he may have been, by whom it was invented : and you who talk of the progress of knowledge, and the improvement of society, and upon that improvement build your hope of its progressive melioration, you know that even so gross and palpable an imposture as this is swallowed by many of the vulgar, and contributes in its sphere to the mischief which it was designed to promote. I admit that such an improved condition of society as you contemplate is possible, and that it ought always to be kept in view : but the error of supposing it too near, of fancying that there is a short road to it, is, of all the errors of these times, the most pernicious, because it seduces the young and generous, and betrays them imperceptibly into an alliance with whatever is flagitious and detestable. The fact is undeniable, that the worst principles in religion, in morals, and in politics, are at this time more prevalent than they ever were known to be in any former age. You need not be told in what manner revolutions in opinion bring about the fate of empires ; and upon this ground you ought to regard the state of the world, both at home and abroad, with fear, rather than with hope.

MONTESINOS.

When I have followed such speculations as may allowably be indulged, respecting what is hidden in the darkness of time and of eternity, I have sometimes thought that the moral and physical order of the world may be so appointed as to coincide ; and that the revolutions of this planet may correspond with the condition of its inhabitants ; so that the convulsions and changes whereto it is destined should occur, when the existing race of men had either become so corrupt, as to be unworthy of the place which they hold in the universe, or were so truly regenerate by the will and word of God, as to be qualified for a higher station in it. Our globe may have gone through many such revolutions. We know the history of the last ; the measure of its wickedness was then filled up. For the future we are taught to expect a happier consummation.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is important that you should distinctly understand the nature and extent of your expectations on that head. Is it upon the Apocalypse that you rest them ?

MONTESINOS.

If you had not forbidden me to expect from this intercourse any communication which might come with the authority of revealed knowledge, I should ask in reply, whether that dark book is indeed to be received for authentic scripture? My hopes are derived from the Prophets and the Evangelists. Believing in them with a calm and settled faith, with that consent of the will, and heart, and understanding, which constitutes religious belief, I find in them the clear annunciation of that kingdom of God upon earth, for the coming of which Christ himself has taught and commanded us to pray.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Remember that the Evangelists in predicting that kingdom, announce a dreadful Advent! And that, according to the received opinion of the Church, wars, persecutions, and calamities of every kind, the triumph of evil, and the coming of Antichrist are to be looked for, before the promises made by the Prophets shall be fulfilled. Consider this also, that the speedy fulfilment of those promises has been the ruling fancy of the most dangerous of all madmen, from John of Leyden and his frantic followers, down to the Saints of Cromwell's army, Venner and his Fifth-Monarchy men, the fanatics of the Cevennes, and the blockheads of your own days, who beheld with complacency the crimes of the French Revolutionists, and the progress of Buonaparte towards the subjugation of Europe, as events tending to bring about the prophecies ; and, under the same besotted persuasion, are ready at this time to co-operate with the miscreants who trade in blasphemy and treason ! But you who neither seek to deceive others nor yourself, . . . you who are neither insane nor insincere, . . . you surely do not expect that the Millennium is to be brought about by the triumph of what are called liberal opinions ; nor by enabling the whole of the lower classes to read the incentives to vice, impiety, and rebellion, which are prepared for them by an unlicensed press ; nor by Sunday Schools, and Religious Tract Societies ; nor by the portentous bibliolatry of the age ! And if you adhere to the letter of the Scriptures, methinks the thought of that consummation for which you look, might serve rather for consolation under the prospect of impending evils, than for a hope upon which the mind can rest in security with a calm and contented delight. .

MONTESINOS,

To this I must reply, that the fulfilment of those calamitous events predicted in the Gospels may safely be referred,* as it usually is, and by the best biblical scholars, to the destruction of Jerusalem. Concerning the visions of the Apocalypse, sublime as they are, I speak with less hesitation, and dismiss them from my thoughts, as more congenial to the fanatics of whom you have spoken than to me. And for the coming of Antichrist, it is no longer a received opinion in these days, whatever it may have been in yours. Your reasoning applies to the enthusiastic Millenarians who discover the number of the Beast, and calculate the year when a Vial is to be poured out, with as much precision as the day and hour of an eclipse. But it leaves my hope unshaken and untouched. I know that the world has improved; I see that it is improving; and I believe that it will continue to improve in natural and certain progress. Good and evil principles are widely at work; a crisis is evidently approaching; it may be dreadful, but I can have no doubts concerning the result. Black and ominous as the aspects may appear, I regard them without dismay.

* Matthew xxiv. Luke xxi. There is no difficulty in the passage, if we bear in mind that two questions were asked by the disciples; that our Lord answered both, and that they, according to their Jewish prepossessions, supposed a connection between them in point of time.

The common exclamation of the poor and helpless, when they feel themselves oppressed, conveys to my mind the sum of the surest and safest philosophy. I say with them, 'God is above,' and trust Him for the event.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

God is above, . . . but the devil is below. Evil principles are, in their nature, more active than good. The harvest is precarious, and must be prepared with labour, and cost, and care ; weeds spring up of themselves, and flourish and seed whatever may be the season. Disease, vice, folly, and madness are contagious ; while health and understanding are incommunicable, and wisdom and virtue hardly to be communicated ! . . . We have come however to some conclusion in our discourse. Your notion of the improvement of the world has appeared to be a mere speculation, altogether inapplicable in practice ; and as dangerous to weak heads and heated imaginations as it is congenial to benevolent hearts. Perhaps that improvement is neither so general, nor so certain as you suppose. Perhaps, even in this country there may be more knowledge than there was in former times, and less wisdom, . . . more wealth and less happiness, . . . more display and less virtue. This must be the subject of future conversation. I will only remind you now, that the French had persuaded themselves this was the most enlightened age of the world, and they the most enlightened people in it, . . . the politest, the most amiable, the most humane of nations, . . . and that a new era of philosophy, philanthropy, and peace was about to commence under their auspices, . . . when they were upon the eve of a revolution which, for its complicated monstrosities, absurdities, and horrors, is more disgraceful to human nature than any other series of events in history. Chew the cud upon this, and farewell!

COLLOQUY III.

THE DRUIDICAL STONES—VISITATIONS OF PESTILENCE.

INCLINATION would lead me to hibernate during half the year in this uncomfortable climate of Great Britain, where few men who have tasted the enjoyments of a better would willingly take up their abode; if it were not for the habits, and still more for the ties and duties which root us to our native soil. I envy the Turks for their sedentary constitutions, which seem no more to require exercise than an oyster does, or a toad in a stone. In this respect, I am by disposition as true a Turk as the Grand Seignior himself; and approach much nearer to one in the habit of inaction, than any person of my acquaintance. Willing however as I should be to believe, that any thing which is habitually necessary for a sound body, would be unerringly indicated by an habitual disposition for it, and that if exercise were as needful as food for the preservation of the animal economy, the desire of motion would recur not less regularly than hunger and thirst, it is a theory which will not bear the test; and this I know by experience.

On a grey sober day, therefore, and in a tone of mind quite accordant with the season, I went out unwillingly to take the air, though if taking physic would have answered the same purpose, the dose would have been preferred as the shortest, and for that reason the least unpleasant remedy. Even on such occasions as this, it is desirable to propose to oneself some object for the satisfaction of accomplishing it, and to set out with the intention of reaching some fixed point, though it should be nothing better than a mile-stone, or a directing post. So I walked to the Circle of Stones upon the Penrith road, because there is a long hill upon the way which would give the muscles some work to perform; and because the sight of this rude monument which has stood during so many centuries, and is likely, if left to itself, to outlast any edifice that man could have erected, gives me always a feeling, which, however often it may be repeated, loses nothing of its force.

The circle is of the rudest kind, consisting of single stones, unhewn, and chosen without any

regard to shape or magnitude, being of all sizes, from seven or eight feet in eight, to three or four. The circle however is complete, and is thirty-three paces in diameter. Concerning this, like all similar monuments in Great Britain, the popular superstition prevails, that no two persons can number the stones alike, and that no person will ever find a second counting confirm the first. My children have often disappointed their natural inclination to believe this wonder, by putting it to the test and disproving it. The number of the stones which compose the circle, is thirty-eight, and besides these, there are ten which form three sides of a little square within, on the eastern side, three stones of the circle itself forming the fourth; this being evidently the place where the Druids who presided had their station; or where the more sacred and important part of the rites and ceremonies (whatever they may have been) were performed. All this is as perfect at this day, as when the Cambrian Bards, according to the custom of their ancient order, described by my old acquaintances, the living members of the Chair of Glamorgan, met there for the last time

On the green turf and under the blue sky,"
Their heads in reverence bare, and bare of foot.

The site also precisely accords with the description which Edward Williams and William Owen give of the situation required for such meeting places :—

————— a high hill top,
Nor bowered with trees, nor broken by the plough :
Remote from human dwellings and the stir
Of human life, and open to the breath
And to the eye of Heaven.

The high hill is now inclosed and cultivated ; and a clump of larches has been planted within the circle, for the purpose of protecting an oak in the centre, the owner of the field having wished to rear one there with a commendable feeling, because that tree was held sacred by the Druids, and therefore, he supposed, might be appropriately placed there. The whole plantation however has been so miserably storm-stricken, that the poor stunted trees are not even worth the trouble of cutting them down for fuel, and so they continue to disfigure the spot. In all other respects this impressive monument of former times is carefully preserved ; the soil within the inclosure is not broken, a path from the road is left, and in latter times a stepping-stile has been placed to accommodate Lakers with an easier access, than by striding over the gate beside it.

The spot itself is the most commanding which could be chosen in this part of the country, without climbing a mountain. Derwent-water and the Vale of Keswick are not seen from it, only the mountains which inclose them on the south and west. Lattrigg and the huge side of Skiddaw are on the north; to the east is the open country toward Penrith, expanding from the Vale of St. John's, and extending for many miles, with Mell-fell in the distance, where it rises alone like a huge tumulus on the right, and Blencathra on the left, rent into deep ravines. On the south-east is the range of Helvellin, from its termination at Wanthwaite Craggs to its loftiest summits, and to Dunmailrais. The lower range of Nathdale-fells lies nearer, in a parallel line with Helvellin; and the dale itself, with its little streamlet immediately below. The heights above Leatheswater, with the Borrowdale mountains, complete the panorama.

While I was musing upon the days of the Bards and Druids, and thinking that Llywarc Hen himself had probably stood within this very circle at a time when its history was known, and the rites for which it was erected still in use, I saw a person approaching, and started a little at perceiving that it was my new acquaintancè from the world of spirits. I am come, said he, to join company with you in your walk: you may as well converse with a Ghost, as stand dreaming of the dead. I dare say you have been wishing that these stones could speak and tell their tale; or that some record were sculptured upon them, though it were as unintelligible as the hieroglyphics, or as an Ogham inscription.

My ghostly friend, I replied, they tell me something to the purport of our last discourse. Here upon ground where the Druids have certainly held their assemblies, and where, not improbably, human sacrifices have been offered up, you will find it difficult to maintain that the improvement of the world has not been unequivocal, and very great.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Make the most of your vantage ground! My position is, that this improvement is not general; that while some parts of the earth are progressive in civilization, others have been retrograde; and that even where improvement appears the greatest, it is partial. For example; with all the meliorations which have taken place in England, since these stones were set up, (and you will not suppose that I who laid down my life for a religious principle, would undervalue the most important of all advantages,)... do you believe that they have extended to all classes? Look at the question well. Consider your fellow-countrymen, both in their physical and intellectual relations; and tell me whether a large portion of the community are in a happier or more hopeful condition at this time, than their forefathers were when Cæsar set foot upon the island?

MONTESINOS.

If it be your aim to prove that the savage state is preferable to the social, I am perhaps the very last person upon whom any arguments to that end could produce the slightest effect. That notion never for a moment deluded me: not even in the ignorance and presumptuousness of youth, when first I perused Rousseau, and was unwilling to feel that a writer whose passionate eloquence I felt and admired so truly, could be erroneous in any of his opinions. But now, in the evening of life, when I know upon what foundation my principles rest, and when the direction of one peculiar course of study has made it necessary for me to learn every thing which books could teach concerning savage life, the proposition appears to me one of the most untenable that ever was advanced by a perverse or a paradoxical intellect.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

I advanced no such paradox, and you have answered me too hastily. The Britons were not savages when the Romans invaded and improved them. They were already far advanced in the barbarous stage of society, having the use of metals, domestic cattle, wheeled carriages, and money, a settled government, and a regular priesthood, who were connected with their fellow Druids on the Continent, and who were not ignorant of letters. . . . Understand me! I admit that improvements of the utmost value have been made, in the most important concerns: but I deny that the melioration has been general; and insist, on the contrary, that a considerable portion of the people are in a state, which, as relates to their physical condition, is greatly worsened, and, as touching their intellectual nature, is assuredly not improved. Look, for example, at the great mass of your populace in town and country, . . a tremendous proportion of the whole community! Are their bodily wants better, or more easily supplied? Are they subject to fewer calamities? Are they happier in childhood, youth, and manhood, and more comfortably or carefully provided for in old age, than when the land was uninclosed, and half covered with woods? With regard to their moral and intellectual capacity, you well know how little of the light of knowledge and of revelation has reached them. They are still in darkness, and in the shadow of death !

MONTESINOS.

I perceive your drift ; and perceive also that when we understand each other, there is likely to be little difference between us. And I beseech you, do not suppose that I am disputing for the sake of disputation ; with that pernicious habit I was never infected, and I have seen too many mournful proofs of its perilous consequences. Toward any person it is injudicious and offensive ; toward you it would be irreverent. Your position is undeniable. Were society to be stationary at its present point, the bulk of the people would, on the whole, have lost rather than gained by the alterations which have taken place during the last thousand years. Yet this must be remembered, that in common with all ranks they are exempted from those dreadful visitations of war, pestilence, and famine, by which these kingdoms were so frequently afflicted of old.

The countenance of my companion changed upon this, to an expression of judicial severity which struck me with awe. Exempted from these visitations! he exclaimed. Mortal man! creature of a day, what art thou, that thou shouldst presume upon any such exemption? Is it from a trust in your own deserts, or a reliance upon the forbearance and long-suffering of the Almighty, that this vain confidence arises?

I was silent.

My friend, he resumed, in a milder tone, but with a melancholy manner, your own individual health and happiness are scarcely more precarious than this fancied security. By the mercy of God, twice during the short space of your life, England has been spared from the horrors of invasion, which might with ease have been effected during the American war, when the enemy's fleet swept the channel, and insulted your very ports, and which was more than once seriously intended during the late long contest. The invaders would indeed have found their graves in that soil which they came to subdue: but before they could have been overcome, the atrocious threat of Buonaparte's General might have been in great part realized, that though he could not answer for effecting the conquest of England, he would engage to destroy its prosperity for a century to come. You have been spared from that chastisement. You have escaped also from the imminent danger of peace with a military Tyrant, which would inevitably have led to invasion, when he should have been ready to undertake and accomplish that great object of his ambition, and you must have been least prepared and least able to resist him. But if the seeds of civil war should at this time be quickening among you, ... if your soil is every where sown with the dragon's teeth, and the fatal crop be at this hour ready to spring up, .. the impending evil will be an hundred fold more terrible than those which have been averted ; and you will have cause to perceive and acknowledge, that the wrath has been suspended only that it may fall the heavier !

May God avert this also ! I exclaimed.

As for famine, he pursued, that curse will always follow in the train of war : and even now the public tranquillity of England is fearfully dependent upon the seasons. And touching pestilence, you fancy yourselves secure, because the plague has not appeared among you for the last hundred and fifty years ; a portion of time, which long as it may seem when compared with the brief term of mortal existence, is as nothing in the physical history of the globe. The importation of that scourge is as possible now as it was in former times: and were it once imported, do you suppose it would rage with less violence among the crowded population of your metropolis, than it did before the Fire, or that it would not reach parts of the country which were never infected in any former visitation? On the contrary, its ravages would be more general and more tremendous, for it would inevitably be carried every where. Your provincial cities have doubled and trebled in size; and in London itself, great part of the population is as much crowded now as it was then, and the space which is covered with houses is increased at least fourfold. What if the sweating-sickness, emphatically called the English disease, were to show itself again? Can any cause be assigned why it is not as likely to break out in the nineteenth century as in the fifteenth? What if your manufactures, according to the ominous opinion which your greatest physiologist has expressed, were to generate for you new physical plagues, as they have already produced a moral pestilence unknown to all preceding ages? What if the small-pox, which you vainly believed to be subdued, should have assumed a new and more formidable character; and (as there seems no trifling grounds for apprehending) instead of being protected by vaccination from its danger, you should ascertain that inoculation itself affords no certain security?...Visitations of this kind are in the order of nature and of Providence. Physically considered, the likelihood of their recurrence becomes every year more probable than the last; and looking to the moral government of the world, was there ever a time when the sins of this kingdom called more cryingly for chastisement?

MONTESINOS.

Μάντι κακῶν!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

I denounce no judgements. But I am reminding you that there is as much cause for the prayer in your Litany against plague, pestilence, and famine, as for that which intreats God to deliver you from all sedition, privy conspiracy, and rebellion; from all false doctrine, heresy, and schism. In this, as in all things, it behoves the Christian to live in a humble and grateful sense of his continual dependence upon the Almighty,..not to rest in a presumptuous confidence upon the improved state of human knowledge, or the altered course of natural visitations.

MONTESINOS.

Oh how wholesome it is to receive instruction with a willing and a humble mind ! In attending to your discourse I feel myself in the healthy state of a pupil, when, without one hostile or contrariant prepossession, he listens to a teacher in whom he has entire confidence. And I feel also how much better it is that the authority of elder and wiser intellects should pass even for more than it is worth, than that it should be undervalued as in these days, and set at nought. When any person boasts that he is the reason of that boast may easily be perceived : it is because he thinks, like Jupiter, that it would be disparaging his own all-wiseness to swear by any thing but himself. But wisdom will as little enter into a proud, or a conceited mind as into a malicious one. In this sense also it may be said, that he who humbleth himself shall be exalted.

Nullius addictus jurare in verba magistri,

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is not implicit assent that I require, but reasonable conviction after calm and sufficient consideration. David was permitted to choose between the three severest dispensations of God's displeasure, and he made choice of pestilence as the least dreadful. Ought a reflecting and religious man to be surprized, if some such punishment were dispensed to this country, not less in mercy than in judgement, as the means of averting a more terrible and abiding scourge? An endemic malady, as destructive as the plague, has naturalized itself among your American brethren, and in Spain. You have hitherto escaped it, speaking with reference to secondary causes, merely because it has not yet been imported. But any season may bring it to your own shores; or at any hour it may appear among you home-bred.

MONTESINOS.

We should have little reason then to boast of our improvements in the science of medicine; for our practitioners at Gibraltar found themselves as unable to stop its progress, or mitigate its symptoms, as the most ignorant empirics in the peninsula.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You were at one time near enough that pestilence to feel as if you were within its reach?

MONTESINOS.

It was in 1800, the year when it first appeared in Andalusia. That summer I fell in at Cintra with a young German, on the way from his own country to his brothers at Cadiz, where they were established as merchants. Many days had not elapsed after his arrival in that city when a ship which was consigned to their firm brought with it the infection; and the first news which reached us of our poor acquaintance was that the yellow fever had broken out in his brother's house, and that he, they, and the greater part of the household were dead. There was every reason to fear that the pestilence would extend into Portugal, both governments being, as usual, slow in providing any measures of precaution, and those measures being nugatory when taken. I was at Faro in the ensuing spring, at the house of Mr. Lempriere, the British Consul. Inquiring of him upon the subject, the old man lifted up his hands, and replied in a passionate manner which I shall never forget, 'O Sir, we escaped by the mercy of God, . . . only by the mercy of God!' The Governor of Algarve, even when the danger was known and acknowledged, would not venture to prohibit the communication with Spain till he received orders from Lisbon; and then the prohibition was so enforced as to be useless. The crew of a boat from the infected province were seized and marched through the country to Tavira: they were then sent to perform quarantine upon a little insulated ground, and the guards who were set over them, lived with them, and were regularly relieved. When such were the precautionary measures, well indeed might it be said, that Portugal escaped only by the mercy of God ! I have often reflected upon the little effect which this imminent danger appeared to produce upon those persons with whom I associated. The young, with that hilarity which belongs to thoughtless youth, used to converse about the places whither they should retire, and the course of life and expedients to which they should be driven, in case it were necessary for them to fly from Lisbon. A few elder and more considerate persons said little upon the subject, but that little denoted a deep sense of the danger, and more anxiety than they thought proper to express. The great majority seemed to be altogether unconcerned ; neither their business, nor their amusements were interrupted ; they feasted, they danced, they met at the card-table as usual ; and the plague (for so it was called at that time, before its nature was clearly understood) was as regular a topic of conversation, as the news brought by the last packet.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And, what was your own state of mind?

MONTESINOS.

Very much what it has long been with regard to the moral pestilence of this unhappy age, and the condition of this country more especially. I saw the danger in its whole extent, and relied on the mercy of God.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In all cases that is the surest reliance : but when human means are available, it becomes a Mahommedan rather than a Christian to rely upon Providence or Fate alone, and make no effort for his own preservation. Individuals never fall into this error among you, drink as deeply as they may of fatalism ; that narcotic will sometimes paralyse the moral sense, but it leaves the faculty of worldly prudence unimpaired. Far otherwise is it with your government ; for such are the notions of liberty in England, that evils of every kind, physical, moral, and political, are allowed their free range. As relates to infectious diseases, for example, this kingdom is now in a less civilized state than it was in my days, three centuries ago, when the leper was separated from general society ; and when, although the science of medicine was at once barbarous and fantastical, the existence of pest-houses showed at least some approaches towards a medical police.

MONTESINOS.

They order these things better in Utopia.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In this, as well as in some other points upon which we shall touch hereafter, the difference between you and the Utopians is as great as between the existing generation and the race by whom yonder circle was set up. With regard to diseases and remedies in general, the real state of the case may be consolatory, but it is not comfortable. Great and certain progress has been made in chirurgery; and if the improvements in the other branch of medical science have not been so certain and so great, it is because the physician works in the dark, and has to deal with what is hidden and mysterious. But the evils for which these sciences are the palliatives, have increased in a proportion that heavily overweighs the benefit of improved therapeutics. For as the intercourse between nations has become greater, the evils of one have been communicated to another. Pigs, Spanish dollars, and Norway rats are not the only commodities and incommunities which have performed the circumnavigation, and are to be found wherever European ships have touched. Diseases also find their way from one part of the inhabited globe to another, wherever it is possible for them to exist. The most formidable endemic or contagious maladies in your nosology are not indigenous; and as far as regards health therefore, the ancient Britons, with no other remedies than their fields and woods afforded them, and no other medical practitioners than their deceitful priests, were in a better condition than their descendants, with all the instruction which is derived from Sydenham and Heberden and Hunter, and with all the powers which chemistry has put into their hands.

MONTESINOS.

You have well said that there is nothing comfortable in this view of the case: but what is there consolatory in it?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The consolation is upon your principle of expectant hope. Whenever improved morals, wiser habits, more practical religion, and more efficient institutions shall have diminished the moral and material causes of disease, a thoroughly scientific practice, the result of long experience and accumulated observations, will then exist, to remedy all that is within the power of human art, and to alleviate what is irremediable. To existing individuals this consolation is something like the satisfaction you might feel in learning that a fine estate was entailed upon your family at the expiration of a lease of ninety-nine years from the present time. But I had forgotten to whom I am talking. A poet always looks onward to some such distant inheritance. His hopes are usually in nubibus, and his expectations in the paulo post futurum tense.

MONTESINOS.

His state is the more gracious then, because his enjoyment is always to come. It is however a real satisfaction to me, that there is some sunshine in your prospect.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

More in mine than in yours, because I command a wider horizon; but I see also the storms which are blackening, and may close over the sky. Our discourse began concerning that portion of the community who form the base of the pyramid; we have unawares taken a more general view, but it has not led us out of the way. Returning to the most numerous class of society, it is apparent that, in the particular point of which we have been conversing, their condition is greatly worsened: they remain liable to the same indigenous diseases as their forefathers, and are exposed moreover to all which have been imported. Nor will the estimate of their condition be improved upon farther inquiry. They are worse fed than when they were hunters, fishers, and herdsmen; their clothing and habitations are little better, and, in comparison with those of the higher classes, immeasurably worse. Except in the immediate vicinity of the collieries, they suffer more from cold than when the woods and turbaries were open. They are less religious than in the days of the Romish faith; and if we consider them in relation to their immediate superiors, we shall find reason to confess that the independence which has been gained since the total decay of the feudal system, has been dearly purchased by the loss of kindly feelings and ennobling attachments. They are less contented, and in no respect more happy. . . . That look implies hesitation of judgement, and an unwillingness to be convinced. Consider the point; go to your books and your thoughts; and when next we meet, you will feel little inclination to dispute the irrefragable statement.

COLLOQUY IV.

FEUDAL SLAVERY.—GROWTH OF PAUPERISM.

THE last conversation had left a weight upon me, which was not lessened when I contemplated the question in solitude. I called to mind the melancholy view which Young has taken of the world in his unhappy poem :—

A part how small of the terraqueous globe
Is tenanted by man! the rest a waste,
Rocks, deserts, frozen seas and burning sands,
Wild haunts of monsters, poisons, stings and death.
Such is earth's melancholy map! But, far
More sad, this earth is a true map of man.

Sad as this representation is, I could not but acknowledge that the moral and intellectual view is not more consolatory than the poet felt it to be; and it was a less sorrowful consideration to think how large a portion of the habitable earth is possessed by savages, or by nations whom inhuman despotisms and monstrous superstitions have degraded in some respects below the savage state, than to observe how small a part of what is called the civilized world is truly civilized; and in the most civilized parts to how small a portion of the inhabitants the real blessings of civilization are confined. In this mood how heartily should I have accorded with Owen of Lanark, if I could have agreed with that happiest and most beneficent and most practical of all enthusiasts, as well concerning the remedy as the disease!

Well, Montesinos, said the Spirit, when he visited me next, have you recollected or found any solid arguments for maintaining that the labouring classes, who form the great bulk of the population, are in a happier condition, physical, moral, or intellectual, in these times, than they were in mine?

MONTESINOS.

Perhaps, Sir Thomas, their condition was better precisely during your age, than it ever has been either before or since. The feudal system had well nigh lost all its inhuman parts, and the worse inhumanity of the commercial system had not yet shown itself.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It was, indeed, a most important age in English history, and till the Reformation so fearfully disturbed it, in many respects a happy and an enviable one. But the process was then beginning, which is not yet completed. As the feudal system relaxed and tended to dissolution, the condition of the multitude was changed. Let us trace it from earlier times! In what state do you suppose the people of this island to have been, when they were invaded by the Romans?

MONTESINOS.

Something worse than the Greeks of the Homeric age: something better than the Sandwich or Tonga islanders when they were visited by Captain Cook. Inferior to the former in arts, in polity, and, above all, in their domestic institutions: superior to the latter as having the use of cattle and being under a superstition in which, amid many abominations, some patriarchal truths were preserved. Less fortunate in physical circumstances than either, because of the climate.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

A viler state of morals than their polyandrian system must have produced, can scarcely be imagined; and the ferocity of their manners, little as is otherwise known of them, is sufficiently shown by their scythed war-chariots, and the fact that in the open country the path from one town to another was by a covered-way.* But in what condition were the labouring classes?

MONTESINOS.

In slavery, I suppose. When the Romans first attacked the island, it was believed at Rome, that slaves were the only booty which Britain could afford; and slaves, no doubt, must have been the staple commodity for which its ports were visited. Different tribes had at different times established themselves here by conquest, and wherever settlements are thus made, slavery is the natural consequence. It was a part of the Roman economy; and when * It is to Sir Richard Hoare that we are indebted for this curious fact. In the course of those researches, which he has pursued so zealously and successfully, with the aid of that remarkable person, Mr. Cunningham, he ascertained the existence of 'covered-ways or lines of communication from one British town to another. Their formation is totally different from that of the ramparts constructed for boundaries, and evidently has not been raised for barriers of defence; the bank being of an equal height on each side, and the area of the ditch broader in proportion and flatter. The frequent occurrence of these on our downs has opened a wide field for reflection and conjecture; much time was spent in doubt and uncertainty; till at length their connexion with the British towns became apparent, and ascertained most clearly the original cause of their formation and destination.'—Ancient Wiltshire, 19.

the Saxons carved out their kingdoms with the sword, the slaves, and their masters too, if any survived, became the property of the new lords of the land,* like the cattle who pastured upon it. It is not likely even that the Saxons should have brought artificers of any kind with them, smiths perhaps alone excepted. Trades of every description† must have been practised by the * Canciani supposes that the Liberi Barones were the old freemen of the barbarous nations, who thus distinguished themselves from those who were newly incorporated or manumitted, and this he thinks is the origin of nobility; for the Adelings were of princely blood. It was the policy of the Lombards*, in particular, to augment their numbers by taking in slaves and making them free.—Præf. ad Barb. Leges. Ant. xii.

† Fuller observes, that, though there is no mention of tradesmen in the Roll of Battle Abbey, such persons nevertheless came over with the Normans. ‘For,’ he says, ‘soon would the head of the best Mounsieur ake without a capper; hands be tanned without a glover; feet be foundred without a tanner, currier, shoemaker; whole body be starved, cold, without weaver, fuller, tailor; hungry, without baker, brewer, cook; harbourless without mason, smith, and carpenter. Say not, it was beneath the French gallantry to stoop to such mean employments, who found all these trades here amongst the English their vassals. For besides that nothing is base which is honest, and necessary for human society, such as are acquainted with the French, both ancient and modern, finicall humour, know they account our tailors, butchers, shoemakers, coblers, cooks, slaves whom they found. The same sort of transfer ensued upon the Norman conquest. After that event, there could have been no fresh supply of domestic slaves, unless they were imported from Ireland, as well as carried thither for sale. That trade did not continue long. Emancipation was promoted by the clergy, and slavery was exchanged for vassalage, which in like manner gradually disappeared as the condition of the people improved.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You are hurrying too fast to that conclusion. Hitherto more has been lost than gained in morals by the transition; and you will not maintain that any thing which is morally injurious,

‘ slovens, compared to the exactness of their fancy and palate ;
 ‘ so that certainly such trades came over with them.

 ‘ ye shall have Cocus, Aurifaber, Pictor, Pistor, Accipitrarius, ‘ Camerarius, Venator, Piscator, Medicus ; Cook, Goldsmith, ‘ Painter, Baker, Falkoner, Chamberlain, Huntsman, Fisher, ‘ Leach, Marshall, Porter, and others, which then held land in

can be politically advantageous. Vassalage I know is a word which bears no favourable acceptance in this liberal age; and slavery is in worse repute. But we must remember that slavery implies a very different state in different ages of the world, and in different stages of society.

MONTESINOS.

In many parts of the East, and of the Mahomedan world, as in the patriarchal times, it is scarcely an evil, among savages it is as little so. In a luxurious state more vices are called into action, the condition of the slave depends more upon the temper of the owner, and the evil then predominates. But slavery is nowhere so bad as in commercial colonies, where the desire of gain hardens the heart: the basest appetites have free scope there; and the worst passions are under little restraint from law, less from religion, and none from public opinion.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You have omitted in this enumeration, that kind of slavery which existed in England.

MONTESINOS.

The slavery of the feudal ages may perhaps be classed midway between the best description of that state and the worst. I suppose it to have been less humane than it generally is in Turkey, less severe than it generally was in Rome and Greece. In too many respects the slaves were at the mercy of their lords. They might be put in irons and punished with stripes; they were sometimes branded; and there is proof that it has been the custom to yoke them in teams like cattle.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Are you then, Montesinos, so much the dupe of words as to account among their grievances a mere practice of convenience?

MONTESINOS.

The reproof was merited. But I was about to say, that there is no reason to think their treatment was generally rigorous. We do not hear of any such office among them as that of the Roman Lorarii, whose office appears by the dramatists to have been no sinecure. And it is certain that they possessed in the laws, in the religion, and probably in the manners of the country, a greater degree of protection than existed to alleviate the lot of the Grecian and Roman slaves.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The practical difference between the condition of the feudal slave,* and of the labouring

* The Villani were not slaves, but copyholders, who paid rent in labour chiefly, as appears from Domesday Book, where husbandman, who succeeded to the business of his station, was mainly this, that the former had neither the feeling nor the insecurity of independence. He served one master as long as he lived; and being at all times sure of the same sufficient subsistence, if he belonged to the estate like the cattle, and was accounted with them as part of the livestock, he resembled them also in the exemption which he enjoyed from all cares concerning his own maintenance and that of his family. The feudal slaves, indeed, were subject to none of those vicissitudes which brought so many of the proudest and most powerful barons to a disastrous end. They had nothing to lose, and they had liberty to hope for; frequently as the reward of their own faithful services, and not seldom from the piety or kindness of their lords. This was a steady hope depending so little upon contingency, that it excited no disquietude or restlessness. They were therefore in general satisfied with the lot to which they were born, as the Greenlander is with his climate, the Bedouin with his deserts, and the Hottentot and the Calmuck with their

the slaves (servi) are nearly as numerous. There was an intermediate grade called Cottarii. Adam Smith describes Cottars as existing in Scotland in his time.

filthy and odious customs; and going on in their regular and unvaried course of duty, generation after generation, they were content.

MONTESINOS.

‘ Fish, Fish, are you in your duty?’ said the young lady in the Arabian Tales, who came out of the kitchen wall, clad in flowered satin and with a rod in her hand. The Fish lifted up their heads and replied, ‘ Yes, yes; if you ‘reckon, we reckon: if you pay your debts, we ‘pay ours; if you fly, we overcome and are ‘content.’ The Fish who were thus content and in their duty, had been gutted, and were in the frying-pan. . . I do not seek, however, to escape from the force of your argument, by catching at the words. On the other hand, I am sure it is not your intention to represent slavery otherwise than as an evil, under any modification.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

That which is a great evil in itself, becomes relatively a good, when it prevents or removes a greater evil; for instance, loss of a limb when life is preserved by the sacrifice; or the acute pain of a remedy by which a chronic disease is cured. Such was slavery in its origin; a commutation for death, gladly accepted as mercy under the arm of a conqueror in battle, or as the mitigation of a judicial sentence. But it led immediately to nefarious abuses; and the earliest records which tell us of its existence, show us also that men were kidnapped for sale. With the principles of Christianity, . . the principles of religious philosophy, . . the only true policy, . . to which mankind must come at last, by which alone all the remediable ills of humanity are to be remedied, and for which you are taught to pray when you entreat that your Father's kingdom may come, . . with those principles slavery is inconsistent, and therefore not to be tolerated, even in speculation.

MONTESINOS.

Yet its fitness, as a commutation for other punishments, is admitted by Michaelis, (though he decides against it,) to be one of the most difficult questions connected with the existing state of society. And in the age of the Revolution, one of the sturdiest Scotch republicans proposed the re-establishment of slavery, as the best or only means for correcting the vices and removing the miseries of the poor.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The proposal of such a remedy must be admitted as full proof of the malignity of the disease. And in further excuse of Andrew Fletcher, it should be remembered, that he belonged to a country where many of the feudal virtues (as well as most of the feudal vices) were at that time in full vigour. But let us return to our historical view of the subject. In feudal servitude there was no motive for cruelty, scarcely any for oppression. There were no needy slave-owners, as there are in commercial colonies; and though slaves might sometimes suffer from a wicked, or even a passionate master, there is no reason to believe that they were habitually overtasked, or subjected to systematic ill treatment; for that indeed can only arise from avarice, and avarice is not the vice of feudal times. Still, however, slavery is intolerable upon Christian principles; and to the influence of those principles it yielded here in England. It had ceased, so as even to be forgotten in my youth; and villenage was advancing fast towards its natural extinction. The courts decided that a tenant having a lease, could not be a villein during its term, for if his labour were at the command of another, how could he undertake to pay rent? Landholders had thus to chuse between rent and villenage, and scarcely wanted the Field of the Cloth of Gold at Ardres to show them which they stood most in need of. And as villenage disappeared, free labourers of various descriptions multiplied; of whom the more industrious and fortunate rose in society, and became tradesmen and merchants; the unlucky and the reprobate became vagabonds.

MONTESINOS.

The latter class appears to have been far more numerous in your age than in mine.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Waiving for the present the question whether they really were so, they appear to have been so partly in consequence of the desperate wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, partly because of the great change in society which succeeded to that contest. During those wars, both parties exerted themselves to bring into the field all the force they could muster. Villeins in great numbers were then emancipated, when they were embodied in arms; and great numbers emancipated themselves, flying to London and other cities for protection from the immediate evils of war, or taking advantage of the frequent changes of property, and the precarious tenure by which it was held, to exchange their own servile condition for a station of freedom with all its hopes and chances. This took place to a great extent, and the probabilities of success were greatly in their favour; for whatever may have been practised in earlier and ruder times, in that age they certainly were not branded like cattle, according to the usage of your sugar islands.

MONTESINOS.

A planter,* who, notwithstanding this curious specimen of his taste and sensibility, was a man of humane studies and humane feelings, describes the refined and elegant manner in which the operation is performed, by way of mitigating the indignation which such an usage ought to excite. He assures us that the stamp is not a branding iron, but a silver instrument; and that it is heated not in the fire, but over the flame of spirits of wine.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Excellent planter! worthy to have been flogged at a gilt whipping-post with a scourge of gold thread!..The practice of marking slaves had fallen into disuse: probably it was only used at first with captives, or with those who were newly-purchased from a distant country, never with those born upon the soil. And there was no means of raising a hue and cry after a runaway slave so effectually as is done by your colonial gazettes,..the only productions of the British colonial press!

MONTESINOS.

Include, I pray you, in the former part of your censure, the journals of the United States, ...the land of democracy and equal rights.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

How much more honourable was the tendency of our laws, and of national feeling in those days, which you perhaps as well as your trans-Atlantic brethren have been accustomed to think barbarous, when compared with this your own age of reason and liberality! The master who killed his slave was as liable to punishment as if he had killed a freeman. Instead of impeding enfranchisement, the laws, as well as the public feeling, encouraged it. If a villein who had fled from his lord remained a year and a day unclaimed upon the King's demesne lands, or in any privileged town, he became free. All doubtful cases were decided in favorem libertatis. Even the established maxim in law, partus sequitur ventrem, was set aside in favour of liberty; the child of a neif was free if the father were a freeman, or if it were illegitimate, in which case it was settled that the free condition of the father should always be presumed.

MONTESINOS.

Such a principle must surely have tended to increase the illegitimate population.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

That inference is drawn from the morals of your own age, and the pernicious effect of your poor laws as they are now thoroughly understood, and deliberately acted upon by a race who are thinking always of their imaginary rights, and never of their duties. You forget the efficacy of ecclesiastical discipline; and that the old Church was more vigilant and therefore more efficient than that which rose upon its ruins. And you suppose that personal liberty was more valued by persons in a state of servitude, than was actually the case. For if in earlier ages emancipation was an act of piety and benevolence, afterwards when the great crisis of society came on, it proceeded more frequently from avarice than from any worthier motive; and the slave who was set free, sometimes found himself much in the situation of a household dog that is turned into the streets.

MONTESINOS.

Are you alluding to the progress of inclosures, which from the accession of the Tudors to the age of the Stuarts* were complained of as the great and crying evil of the times?

* The evil is thus noticed by a writer of James the First's reign, who is less known than he deserves to be for his oddity and his merit; 'This island of ours, within these late days, hath bred a great number of these field-briars, which unnaturally turn their mother into barrenness. Oppressors, In-

SIR THOMAS MORE.

That process originated as soon as rents began to be of more importance than personal

‘ closers, Depopulators, Deportators, Depravators, that turn the ‘ land to ruin for a private benefit; and work out a particular ‘ gain from a public and general loss.

‘ Again, said I, where is it? I will speak boldly, I never ‘ knew great man grow greater by his depopulations, and I ‘ hope no man will say, he hath grown better by them. Corn-
‘ fields are turned to sheep-walks; once inhabited towns feede ‘ oxen; and Churches are made shepherds cottages; and yet the ‘ doers of all this never the richer. They keep less hospitality,
‘ for a few rooms in London serve their turns; they extort ‘ sorer rents, and yet they have never the more money.

‘ It cannot bee denied but the main end of these courses was ‘ profit, and enhansing their estates, and lo! in this very end ‘ God crosseth them. Speak what you will of their pride, of ‘ turning the alms they should give to the poor into feasts for
‘ the rich, of their infrugal courses: I say confidently, hïc
‘ digitus Dei, here is the very hand of God striking them.
‘ Man, though he hath authority, will not look to these field-
‘ bryars, but let them waste and forage, and play the Abime- ‘ lechs; but God will. But if wee doe not looke to it, let me say
‘ to you, as Jotham to the Shechemites of that aspiring bramble, ‘ Judg. 9: If fire come not out of Shechem to devour Abimelech;
‘ fire will come from Abimelech to devour Shechem. If you ‘ undoe not the oppressions of the field-bryars, their oppres-
‘ sions will undoe us all.’—Adamer's Divine Herball, p. 128.

1635. The Lord Keeper Coventry says in his Charge to the Judges, ‘ I do require you, that you make a strict inquiry after ‘ depopulations and inclosures; a crime of a crying nature, that services, and money more convenient to the landlords than payments in kind.

MONTESINOS.

And this I suppose began to be the case under Edward III. The splendour of his court, and the foreign wars in which he was engaged, must have made money more necessary to the knights and nobles than it had ever been before, except during the Crusades.

‘barreth God of his honour, and the King of his subjects.
 ‘Churches and Houses go down together. His Majesty
 ‘knoweth and taketh notice, that according to former directions ‘given to you in this place, you have given it in charge to the ‘grand Inquests to inquire, but to little effect: and without ‘doubt the Freeholders of England do hate and detest them.
 ‘Depopulation is an oppression of a high nature, and com‘monly done by the greatest persons, that keep the juries under
 ‘and in awe; and this is the cause there are no more presented
 ‘and brought in question. But howsoever your charge and ‘inquiry touching this point hath not taken effect worthy his ‘Majesty’s care and your pains, yet his Majesty willeth that you ‘do not cease, but inquire on still. For it is his resolution, ‘against all opposition, to make all men see that he hath a care
 ‘of this overspreading evil, and of the means of his people, to ‘have Churches and Towns demolished, and his people eaten ‘up like bread, to satisfy the greedy desires of a few, who ‘do waste as profusely as they do gather together uncon‘scionably, and bring unto their posterity that woe which is ‘pronounced to those that lay house to house and field to field,
 ‘to dwell alone in the midst of the earth.’—Rushworth,
 ii. 295.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The wars of York and Lancaster retarded the process ; but immediately after the termination of that fierce struggle, it was accelerated by the rapid growth of commerce, and by the great influx of wealth from the new found world. Under a settled and strong and vigilant government, men became of less value as vassals and retainers, because the boldest barons no longer dared contemplate the possibility of trying their strength against the crown, or attempting to disturb the succession. Four-legged animals therefore were wanted for slaughter more than two-legged ones : and moreover, sheep* could be shorn, . . . whereas the art of fleecing the tenantry was in its infancy, and could not always be practised with the same certain success. A trading spirit thus gradually superseded the rude but kindlier principle of the feudal system : profit and loss became the rule of conduct ; in came calculation, and out went feeling.

* ‘ If the King’s honour, as some men say, standeth in the ‘ great multitude of people, then these grasiers, inclosers, and ‘ rent-rearers are hinderers of the King’s honour. For where ‘ as have been a great many householders and inhabitants, ‘ there is now but a shepherd and his dog.’—Latimer.

MONTESINOS.

than the Dragon of Wantley in those days, began to devour men and fields and houses. The same process is at this day going on in the Highlands, though under different circumstances; some which palliate the evil, and some which aggravate the injustice.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The real nature of the evil was misunderstood by my contemporaries, and for some generations afterward. A decrease of population was the effect complained of; whereas the greater grievance was that a different and worse population was produced.

MONTESINOS.

I comprehend you. The same effect followed which has been caused in these days by the extinction of small farms.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The same in kind, but greater in degree; or at least if not greater; or so general in extent, it was more directly felt. When that ruinous fashion prevailed in your age, there were many resources for the class of people who were thus thrown out of their natural and proper place in the social system. Your fleets and armies at that time required as many hands as could be supplied; and women and children were consumed with proportionate rapidity by your manufactures. Moreover there was the wholesome drain of emigration open ;

But under the Tudors there existed no such means for disposing of the ejected population ; and except the few who could obtain places as domestic servants, or employment as labourers and handicraftsmen, (classes it must be remembered, for all which the employ was diminished by the very ejectment in question,) they who were turned adrift soon found themselves houseless and hopeless, and were reduced to prey upon that society which had so unwisely as well as inhumanly discarded them.

MONTESINOS.

Thus it is that men collectively as well as individually create for themselves so large a part of the evils they endure.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Enforce upon your contemporaries that truth which is as important in politics as in ethics, and you will not have lived in vain ! Scatter that seed upon the waters, and doubt not of the harvest ! Vindicate always the system of nature, . . . in other and sounder words, the ways of God, . . . while you point out with all faithfulness, what ills

Remediable and yet unremedied

Afflict man's wretched race, and the approbation of your own heart will be sufficient reward on earth.

MONTESINOS.

The will has not been wanting.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

There are cases in which the will carries with it the power: and this is of them. No man was ever yet deeply convinced of any momentous truth, without feeling in himself the power as well as the desire of communicating it.

MONTESINOS.

True, Sir Thomas: but the perilous abuse of that feeling by enthusiasts and fanatics leads to an error in the opposite extreme. We sacrifice too much to prudence; and, in fear of incurring the danger or the reproach of enthusiasm, too often we stifle the holiest impulses of the understanding and the heart.

Our doubts are traitors,

And make us lose the good we oft might win,

By fearing to attempt.

... But, I pray you, resume your discourse. The monasteries were probably the chief palliatives of this great evil while they existed.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Their power of palliating it was not great, for the expenditure of those establishments kept a just pace with their revenues. They accumulated no treasures, and never were any incomes more beneficially * employed. The great abbies vied with each other in architectural magnificence, in this more especially, but likewise in every branch of liberal expenditure, giving employment to great numbers, which was better than giving unearned food. They provided, as it became them, for the old and helpless also. That they prevented the necessity of raising rates for the poor, by the copious alms which they distributed, and by indiscriminately feeding the indigent, has been inferred, because those rates became necessary immediately after the suppression of the religious houses. But this is one of those hasty inferences which have no other foundation than a mere coincidence of time in the supposed cause and effect.

Gen. de S. Benito, t. iii. p. 41.*

MONTESINOS.

...For which you have furnished a proverbial illustration in your excellent story of Tenterden Steeple, and Goodwin Sands.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

That illustration would have been buried in the dust, if it had not been repeated by Hugh Latimer at St. Paul's Cross. It was the only thing in my writings by which he profited. If he had learnt more from them, he might have died in his bed, with less satisfaction to himself, and less honour from posterity. We went different ways, but we came to the same end, and met where we had little expectation of meeting. I must do him the justice to say, that when he forwarded the work of destruction, it was with the hope and intention of employing the materials in a better edifice ; and that no man opposed the sacrilegious temper of the age more bravely. The monasteries, in the dissolution of which he rejoiced as much as he regretted the infamous disposal of their spoils, delayed the growth of pauperism, by the corrodies with which they were charged ; the effect of these reservations on the part of the founders and benefactors being, that a comfortable and respectable support was provided for those who grew old in the service of their respective families ; and there existed no great family, and perhaps no wealthy one, which had not entitled itself thus to dispose of some of its aged dependents. And the extent of the depopulating system was limited while those houses endured ; because, though some of the great abbots were not less rapacious than the lay lords, and more criminal, the heads in general could not be led, like the nobles, into a prodigal expenditure, the burthen of which fell always upon the tenants ; and rents in kind were to them more convenient than in money, their whole economy being founded upon that system, and adapted to it.

MONTESINOS.

Both facts and arguments were indeed strongly on your side when you wrote against the Supplication of Beggars : but the form in which you embodied them gave the adversary an advantage, for it was connected with one of the greatest abuses and absurdities of the Romish Church.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Montesinos, I allow you to call it an abuse ; but if you think any of the abuses of that church were in their origin so unreasonable as to deserve the appellation of absurdities, you must have studied its history with less consideration and a less equitable spirit than I have given you credit for. Both Master Fish and I had each our prejudices and errors. We were both sincere: Master Fish would undoubtedly have gone to the stake in defence of his opinions, as cheerfully as I laid down my neck upon the block; like his namesake in the tale which you have quoted, he too, when in Nix's frying-pan, would have said that he was in his duty, and content. But withal he cannot be called an honest man, unless in that sort of liberal signification by which, in these days, good words are so deformed from their original and genuine meaning as to express precisely the reverse of what was formerly intended by them. More gross exaggerations, and more rascally misstatements could hardly be made by one of your own thorough-paced revolutionists, than those upon which the whole argument of his Supplication is built.

MONTESINOS.

If he had fallen into your hands, you would have made a stock-fish of him.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Perhaps so. I had not then learnt, that laying men by the heels is not the best way of curing them of an error in the head. But the King protected him. Henry had too much sagacity not to perceive the consequences which such a book was likely to produce, and he said after perusing it, ‘ If a man should pull down an ‘ old stone wall, and begin at the bottom, the ‘ upper part thereof might chance to fall upon ‘ his head.’ But he saw also that it tended to serve his immediate purpose.

MONTESINOS.

I marvel that good old John Fox, upright, downright man as he was, should have inserted in his Acts and Monuments a libel like this, which contains no arguments except such as were adapted to ignorance, cupidity, and malice.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Old John Fox ought to have known that, however advantageous the dissolution of the monastic houses might be to the views of the Reformers, it was every way injurious to the labouring classes. As far as they were concerned, the transfer of property was always to worse hands. The tenantry were deprived of their best landlords,* artificers of their best employers,

* The raising of rents is thus complained of by the excellent old Bishop Latimer in his homely and lively manner. ‘ I doubt most rich men have too much, for without too much we can get nothing. As, for example, the physician,—if the poor man be diseased, he can have no help without too much; and of the lawyer the poor man can get no counsel, expedition, nor help in his matter, except he give him too much. At merchants’ the poor and miserable of their best and surest friends. There would have been no insurrections in behalf of the old religion, if the zeal of the peasantry had not been inflamed by a sore feeling of the injury which they suffered in the change. A great increase of the vagabond population was the direct and immediate consequence. They who [were] ejected from their tenements, or deprived of their accustomed employment, were turned loose upon society; and the greater number, of course and of necessity, ran wild.

MONTESINOS.

Wild, indeed! The old chroniclers* give a

‘hands no kind of ware can be had, except we give for it too much. You landlords, you rent-raisers—I may say you step lords, you unnatural lords, you have for your possessions yearly too much! For that here before went for 20 or 60 pound by year, which is an honest portion to be had gratis in one lordship, of another man’s sweat and labour, now is let for 50 or 100 pound by year. Of this too much cometh this monstrous and portentous dearth made by man, notwithstanding God doth send us plentifully the fruits of the earth, mercifully, contrary unto our deserts. Notwithstanding, too much which these rich men have causeth such dearth, that poor men which live of their labour cannot with the sweat of their face have a living, all kind of victuals is so dear; pigs, geese, capons, chickens, eggs, &c., these things, with others, are so unreasonably enhaunced. And I think verily that if it thus continue, we shall at length be constrained to pay for a pig a pound.’

* See Harrison’s Description of England, where they are dreadful picture of their numbers and of their wickedness, which called forth and deserved the utmost severity of the law. They lived like savages in the woods and wastes, committing the most atrocious actions, stealing children, and burning, breaking, or otherwise disfiguring their limbs for the purpose of exciting compassion, and obtaining alms by this most flagitious of all imaginable crimes. Surely we have nothing so bad as this.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The crime of stealing children for such purposes is rendered exceedingly difficult by the ease and rapidity with which a hue and cry can now be raised throughout the land, and the eagerness and detestation with which the criminal would be pursued; still, however, it is sometimes practised. In other respects the professional beggars of the nineteenth century are not a whit better than their predecessors of the sixteenth: and your gipsies and travelling potters, who, gipsy-like, pitch their tents upon the common, or by the way side, retain with as much fidelity the manners and morals of the described as ‘ chiefly keeping the champaine soils in summer ‘ to avoid the scorching heat, and the woodland grounds in ‘ winter to eschew the blustering winds.’

old vagabonds, as they do the cant, or pedlar's French, which this class of people are said to have invented * in the age whereof we are now speaking,

MONTESINOS.

But the number of our vagabonds has greatly diminished. In your Henry's reign it is affirmed that no fewer than 72,000† criminals were

* ' In counterfeiting the Egyptian rogues they have devised
' a language among themselves, which they name canting, but ' others pedlar's French, a speech compact thirty years since of ' English and a great number of odd words of their own devising,
' without all order or reason : and yet such is it as none but
' themselves are able to understand. The first deviser thereof
' was hanged by the neck, a just reward no doubt for his deserts,
' and a common end to all of that profession.'—Harrison in Holinshed, vol. i. p. 309. Ed. 1807.

† ' There is not one year commonly wherein three hundred ' or four hundred of them are not devoured and eaten up by the ' gallows in one place or other. It appeareth by Cardan (who ' writeth it upon the report of the Bishop of Lexovia), in the ' geniture of King Edward the Sixth, how Henry the Eighth,
' executing his laws very severely against such idle persons, I ' mean great thieves, petty thieves and rogues, did hang up three-
' score and twelve thousand of them in his time. He seemed
' for a while greatly to have terrified the rest ; but since his ' death the number of them is so increased, yea although we have ' had no wars, which are a great occasion of their breed, (for it ' is the custom of the more idle sort, having once served, or but ' seen the other side of the sea under colour of service, to shake
' hand with labour for ever, thinking it a disgrace for himself to hanged; you have yourself described them as strung up by scores upon a gibbet all over the country. Even in the golden days of good Queen Bess, the executions were from three to four hundred annually. A large allowance must be made for the increased humanity of the nation, and the humaner temper with which the laws are administered: but the new crimes which increased wealth and a system of credit on one hand, and increased ingenuity, and new means of mischief on the part of the depredators have produced, must also be taken into the account. And the result will show a diminution in the number of those who prey upon society either by open war or secret wiles.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Add your paupers to the list; and you will then have added to it not less than an eighth of your whole population. But looking at the depredators alone, perhaps it will be found that the evil is at this time more widely extended, more intimately connected with the constitution of society, like a chronic and organic disease,

‘return unto his former trade,) that, except some better order
 ‘be taken, or the laws already made be better executed, such as ‘dwell in uplandish towns and little villages shall live but in ‘small safety and rest.’—Harrison, ut supra, p. 315. Ed. 1807.

and therefore more difficult of cure. Like other vermin they are numerous in proportion as they find shelter; and for this species of noxious beast, large towns and manufacturing districts afford better cover than the forest or the waste. The fault lies in your institutions, which in the time of the Saxons were better adapted to maintain security and order, than they are now. No man in those days could prey upon society, unless he were at war with it as an outlaw, a proclaimed and open enemy. Rude as the laws were, the purposes of law had not then been perverted: it had not been made a craft; it served to deter men from committing crimes, or to punish them for the commission; never to shield notorious, acknowledged, impudent guilt from condign punishment. And in the fabric of society, imperfect as it was, the outline and rudiments of what it ought to be were distinctly marked in some main parts, where they are now well-nigh utterly effaced. Every person had his place. There was a system of superintendence every where, civil as well as religious. They who were born in villenage, were born to an inheritance of labour, but not of inevitable depravity and wretchedness. If one class were regarded in some respects as cattle, they were at least taken care of; they were trained, fed, sheltered, and protected; and there was an eye upon them when they strayed. None were wild, unless they ran wild wilfully, and in defiance of control. None were beneath the notice of the priest, nor placed out of the possible reach of his instruction and his care. But how large a part of your population are like the dogs at Lisbon and Constantinople, unowned, unbroken to any useful purpose, subsisting by chance or by prey, living in filth, mischief and wretchedness; a nuisance to the community while they live, and dying miserably at last! This evil had its beginning in my days; it is now approaching fast to its consummation.

COLLOQUY V.

DECAY OF THE FEUDAL SYSTEM.—EDWARD VI.

—ALFRED.

I HAD retired to my library, as usual, after dinner, and while I was wishing for the appearance of my ghostly visitor, he became visible. Behold me to your wish! said he. Thank you, I replied, for those precious words.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Wherefore precious?

MONTESINOS.

Because they show that spirits who are in bliss perceive our thoughts; . . . that that communion with the departed for which the heart yearns in its moods of intensest feeling, is in reality attained when it is desired.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You deduce a large inference from scanty premises. As if it were not easy to know without any super-human intuition that you would wish for the arrival of one whose company you like, at a time when you were expecting it.

MONTESINOS.

And is this all?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

All that the words necessarily imply. For the rest, crede quod habes et habes, according to the scurvy tale which makes my friend Erasmus a horse-stealer, and fathers Latin rhymes upon him. But let us take up the thread of our discourse; or, as we used to say in old times, 'begin it again and mend it, for it is neither mass nor matins.'

MONTESINOS.

You were saying that the evil of a vagrant and brutalized population began in your days,* and is approaching to its consummation at this time.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The decay of the feudal system produced it. When armies were no longer raised upon that system, soldiers were disbanded at the end of a war, as they are now; that is to say, they were turned adrift to fare as they could, . . . to work if they could find employment; otherwise to beg, starve, live upon the alms of their neighbours, or prey upon a wider community in a manner more congenial to the habits and temper of their old vocation. In consequence of the gains which were to be obtained by inclosures and sheep-farming, families were unhoused and driven loose upon the country. These persons, and they who were emancipated from villanage, or who had in a more summary manner emancipated themselves, multiplied in poverty and wretchedness. Lastly, owing to the fashion for large households of retainers, great numbers of men were trained up in an idle and dissolute way of life, liable at any time to be cast off when age or accident invalidated them, or when the master of the family died; and then if not ashamed to beg, too lewd to work, and ready for any kind of mischief. Owing to these co-operating causes, a huge population of outcasts was produced, numerous enough seriously to infest society, yet not so large as to threaten its subversion.

* Harrison says, 'it is not yet full threescore years since this trade began; but how it hath prospered since that time it is easy to judge, for they are now supposed, of one sex and another, to amount not above 10,000 persons.'—Holinshed, i. 309.

MONTESINOS.

A derangement of the existing system produced them then; they are a constituent part of the system now. With you they were, as you have called them, outcasts: with us, to borrow an illustration from foreign institutions, they have become a cast. But during two centuries the evil appears to have decreased. Why was this ?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Because it was perceived to be an evil, and could never at any time be mistaken for a healthful symptom. And because circumstances tended to suspend its progress. The habits of these unhappy persons being at first wholly predatory, the laws proclaimed a sort of crusade against them, and great and inhuman riddance was made by the executioner. Foreign service opened a drain in the succeeding reigns : many also were drawn off by the spirit of maritime adventure, preferring the high seas to the high way, as a safer course of plundering. Then came an age of civil war, with its large demand for human life. Meanwhile as the old arrangements of society crumbled and decayed, new ones were formed. The ancient fabric was repaired in some parts and modernized in others. And from the time of the Restoration the people supposed their institutions to be stable, because after long and violent convulsions they found themselves at rest, and the transition which was then going on, was slow, silent, and unperceived. The process of converting slaves and villeins into servants and free peasantry had ended ; that of raising a manufacturing populace and converting peasantry into poor was but begun ; and it proceeded slowly for a full hundred years.

MONTESINOS.

Those hundred years were the happiest which England has ever known.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Perhaps so : καρπὸς μέγιστος ἀταραξία.

MONTESINOS.

With the exception of the efforts which were made for restoring the exiled family of the Stuarts, they were years of quiet uniform prosperity and advancement. The morals of the country recovered from the contagion which Charles II. imported from France, and for which Puritanism had prepared the people. Visitations of pestilence were suspended. Sectarians enjoyed full toleration, and were contented. The Church proved itself worthy of the victory which it had obtained. The Constitution, after one great but short struggle, was well balanced and defined ; and if the progress of art, science, and literature was not brilliant, it was steady, and the way for a brighter career was prepared.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The way was prepared meantime for evil as well as for good. You were retrograde in sound policy, sound philosophy, and sound learning. Our business at present is wholly with the first. Because your policy, defective as it was at the best, had been retrograde, discoveries in physics, and advances in mechanical science which would have produced nothing but good in Utopia, became as injurious to the weal of the nation, as they were instrumental to its wealth. But such had your system imperceptibly become, and such were your statesmen, that the wealth of nations was considered as the sole measure of their prosperity.

MONTESINOS.

In feudal ages the object of those monarchs who had any determinate object in view, was either to extend their dominions by conquest from their neighbours, or to increase their authority at home by breaking the power of a turbulent nobility. In commercial ages the great and sole object of government when not engaged in war, was to augment its revenues, for the purpose of supporting the charges which former wars had induced, or which the apprehension of fresh ones rendered necessary. And thus it has been, that of the two main ends of government, which are the security of the subjects, and the improvement of the nation, the latter has never been seriously attempted, scarcely indeed taken into consideration ; and the former imperfectly attained. .

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Fail not, however, I entreat you, to bear in mind that this has not been the fault of your rulers at any time. It has been their misfortune, . . . an original sin in the constitution of the society wherein they were born. Circumstances, which they did not make and could not control, have impelled them onward in ways which neither for themselves nor the nation were ways of pleasantness and peace.

MONTESINOS.

There is one beautiful exception, . . Edward VI.

That blessed Prince, whose saintly name might move
The understanding heart to tears of reverent love.

He would have struck into the right course.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You have a catholic feeling concerning Saints, Montesinos, though you look for them in the protestant kalendar. Edward deserves to be remembered with that feeling. But had his life been prolonged to the full age of man, it would not have been in his power to remedy the evil which had been done in his father's reign; and during his own minority. To have effected that would have required a strength and obduracy of character incompatible with his meek and innocent nature. In intellect and attainments he kept pace with his age, a more stirring and intellectual one than any which had gone before it: but in the wisdom of the heart he was far beyond that age, or indeed any that has succeeded it. It cannot be said of him as of Henry of Windsor, that he was fitter for a cloister than a throne, but he was fitter for an heavenly crown than a terrestrial one. This country was not worthy of him, . . . scarcely this earth !

MONTESINOS.

There is a homely verse common in village churchyards, the truth of which has been felt by many a heart, as some consolation in its keenest afflictions :

God calls them first whom he loves best.

But surely no Prince ever more sedulously employed himself to learn his office. His views in some respects were not in accord with the more enlarged principles of trade, which experience has taught us. But on the other hand he judged rightly what ‘ the medicines were by which the sores of the commonwealth might be healed.’ His prescriptions are as applicable now as they were then, and in most points as needful: they were ‘good education, good example, good laws, and the just execution of those laws: punishing the vagabond and idle, encouraging the good, ordering well the customs, and engendering friendship in all parts of the commonwealth.’ In these, and more especially in the first of these, he hoped and purposed to have ‘shown his device.’ But it was not permitted. Nevertheless he has his reward. It has been more wittily than charitably said that Hell is paved with good intentions: they have their place in Heaven also. Evil thoughts and desires are justly accounted to us for sin; assuredly, therefore, the sincere goodwill will be accepted for the deed, when means and opportunity have been wanting to bring it to effect.* There are feelings and purposes as well as ‘thoughts,

. . . . whose very sweetness yieldeth proof
That they were born for immortality.’

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Those great legislative measures whereby the

* The converse of this would be a fearful opinion. Galte-rius (whoever that personage may have been) considers the question, which it seems had been proposed to him, and says credo neminem damnari pro futuris operibus malis quæ non fecit, quamvis ea facturum esset, si in vitâ diutius remaneret.—Martene et Durand. Vet. Mon. &c. Amplis. Col. t. i. 845.

character of a nation is changed and stamped, are more practicable in a barbarous age, than in one so far advanced as that of the Tudors; under a despotic government, than under a free one; and among an ignorant, rather than an inquiring people. Obedience is then either yielded to a power which is too strong to be resisted; or willingly given to the acknowledged superiority of some commanding mind, carrying with it, as in such ages it does, an appearance of divinity. Our incomparable Alfred was a Prince in many respects favourably circumstanced for accomplishing a great work like this, if his victory over the Danes had been so complete as to have secured the country against any further evils from that tremendous enemy. And had England remained free from the scourge of their invasions under his successors, it is more than likely that his institutions would at this day have been the groundwork of your polity.

MONTESINOS.

If you allude to that part of the Saxon law, which required that all the people should be placed under borh, I must observe that even those writers who regard the name of Alfred with the greatest reverence always condemn this part of his system of government.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is a question of degree. The just medium between too much superintendence and too little, . . . the mystery whereby the free will of the subject is preserved, while it is directed by the fore purpose of the state, (which is the secret of true polity) . . . is yet to be found out. But this is certain, that whatever be the origin of government, its duties are patriarchal, that is to say, parental: superintendence is one of those duties, and is capable of being exercised to any extent by delegation and subdelegation.

MONTESINOS.

The Madras system, my excellent friend Dr. Bell would exclaim, if he were here. That which, as he says, gives in a school to the master, the hundred eyes of Argus, and the hundred hands of Briareus, might in a state give omnipresence to law, and omnipotence to order. This is indeed the fair ideal of a commonwealth.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And it was this at which Alfred* aimed. His means were violent, because the age was barbarous: experience would have shown wherein they required amendment, and as manners improved the laws would have been softened with them. But they disappeared altogether during the years of internal warfare and turbulence which ensued. The feudal order which was established with the Norman conquest, or at least methodized after it, was in this part of its scheme less complete: still it had the same bearing. When that also went to decay, municipal police did not supply its place. Church discipline then fell into disuse; clerical influence was lost; and the consequence now is, that in a country where one part of the community enjoys the highest advantages of civilization with which any people upon this globe have ever in any age been favoured, there is among the lower classes a mass of ignorance, vice and wretchedness, which no generous heart can contemplate without grief; and which, when the other signs of the times are considered, may reasonably excite alarm for the fabric of society that rests upon such a base. It resembles the Tower in your own Vision, its beautiful summit elevated above all other buildings, the foundations placed upon the sand and mouldering.

MONTESINOS.

Rising so high, and built so insecure,
Ill may such perishable work endure !

You will not, I hope, come to that conclusion !
You will not, I hope, say with the evil Prophet,

The fabric of her power is undermined ;
The Earthquake underneath it will have way,
And all that glorious structure, as the wind
Scatters a summer cloud, be swept away !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Look at the populace of London, and ask yourself what security there is that the same blind fury which broke out in your childhood against the Roman Catholics may not be excited against the government, in one of those opportunities which accident is perpetually offering to the desperate villains, whom your laws serve rather to protect than to punish !

MONTESINOS.

It is an observation of Mercier's that despotism loves large cities. The remark was made with reference to Paris, only a little while before the French Revolution ! But even if he had looked no farther than the history of his own country and of that very metropolis, he might have found sufficient proof that insubordination and anarchy like them quite as well.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

London is the heart of your commercial system, but it is also the hot-bed of corruption. It is at once the centre of wealth and the sink of misery; the seat of intellect and empire, and yet a wilderness wherein they, who live like wild beasts upon their fellow-creatures, find prey and cover. Other wild beasts have long since been extirpated: even in the wilds of Scotland, and of barbarous, or worse than barbarous Ireland, the wolf is no longer to be found; a degree of civilization this to which no other country has attained. Man, and man alone, is permitted to run wild. You plough your fields and harrow them; you have your scarifiers to make the ground clean; and if after all this weeds should spring up, the careful cultivator roots them out, by hand. But ignorance and misery and vice are allowed to grow, and blossom and seed, not on the waste alone, but in the very garden and pleasure ground of society and civilization. Old Thomas Tusser's coarse remedy is the only one which legislators have yet thought of applying!

MONTESINOS.

What remedy is that?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

'Twas the husbandman's practice in his days and mine:

Where plots full of nettles annoyeth the eye,
Sow hempseed among them, and nettles will die.

MONTESINOS.

The use of hemp indeed has not been spared. But with so little avail has it been used, . . or rather to such ill effect, that every public execution, instead of deterring villains from guilt, serves only to afford them opportunity for it. Perhaps the very risk of the gallows operates upon many a man among the inducements to commit the crime whereto he is tempted ; for with your true gamester the excitement seems to be in proportion to the value of the stake. Yet I hold as little with the humanity-mongers, who deny the necessity and lawfulness of inflicting capital punishment in any case, as with the shallow moralists, who exclaim against vindictive justice, when punishment would cease to be just, if it were not vindictive.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And yet the inefficacious punishment of guilt is less to be deplored and less to be condemned than the total omission of all means for preventing it. . Many thousands in your metropolis rise every morning without knowing how they are to subsist during the day ; or, many of them, where they are to lay their heads at night. All men, even the vicious themselves, know that wickedness leads to misery; but many, even among the good and the wise, have yet to learn that misery is almost as often the cause of wickedness.

MONTESINOS.

There are many who know this, but believe that it is not in the power of human institutions to prevent this misery. They see the effect, but regard the causes as inseparable from the condition of human nature.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

As surely as God is good, so surely there is no such thing as necessary evil. For by the religious mind sickness and pain and death are not to be accounted evils. Moral evils are of your own making; and undoubtedly the greater part of them may be prevented; though it is only in Paraguay (the most imperfect of Utopias) that any attempt at prevention has been carried into effect. Deformities of mind, as of body, will sometimes occur. Some voluntary cast-aways there will always be, whom no fostering kindness and no parental care can preserve from self-destruction; but if any are lost for want of care and culture, there is a sin of omission in the society to which they belong.

MONTESINOS.

The practicability of forming such a system of prevention may easily be allowed, where, as in Paraguay, institutions are foreplanned, and not, as everywhere in Europe, the slow and varying growth of circumstances. But to introduce it into an old society, hic labor, hoc opus est! The Augean stable might have been kept clean by ordinary labour, if from the first the filth had been removed every day;..when it had accumulated for years, it became a task for Hercules to cleanse it. Alas, the age of Heroes and Demigods is over!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

There lies your error! As no General will ever defeat an enemy whom he believes to be invincible, so no difficulty can be overcome by those who fancy themselves unable to overcome it. Statesmen in this point are, like physicians, afraid, lest their own reputation should suffer, to try new remedies in cases where the old routine of practice is known and proved to be ineffectual. Ask yourself whether the wretched creatures of whom we are discoursing are not abandoned to their fate without the slightest attempt to rescue them from it? The utmost which your laws profess is, that under their administration no human being shall perish for want: this is all! To effect this you draw from the wealthy, the industrious, and the frugal, a revenue exceeding tenfold the whole expenses of government under Charles I., and yet even with this enormous expenditure upon the poor it is not effected. I say nothing of those who perish for want of sufficient food and necessary comforts, the victims of slow suffering and obscure disease; nor of those who, having crept to some brick-kiln at night, in hope of preserving life by its warmth, are found there dead in the morning. Not a winter passes in which some poor wretch does not actually die of cold and hunger in the streets of London! With all your public and private eleemosynary establishments, with your eight million of poor-rates, with your numerous benevolent associations, and with a spirit of charity in individuals which keeps pace with the wealth of the richest nation in the world, these things happen, to the disgrace of the age and country, and to the opprobrium of humanity, for want of police and order! . . . You are silent!

MONTESINOS.

Some shocking examples occurred to me. The one of a poor Savoyard boy with his monkey starved to death in St. James's Park. The other, which is, if that be possible, a still more disgraceful case, is recorded incidentally in Rees's Cyclopædia under the word Monster.

It is only in a huge overgrown city that such cases could possibly occur.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The extent of a metropolis ought to produce no such consequences. Whatever be the size of a bee-hive or an ant-hill, the same perfect order is observed in it.

MONTESINOS.

That is because bees and ants act under the guidance of unerring instinct.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

As if instinct were a superior faculty to reason! But the statesman, as well as the sluggard, may be told to 'go to the ant and the bee, consider their ways and be wise!' It is for reason to observe and profit by the examples which instinct affords it.

MONTESINOS.

A country modelled upon Apiarian laws would be a strange Utopia! the bowstring would be used there as unmercifully as it is in the Seraglio, . . . to say nothing of the summary mode of bringing down the population to the means of subsistence. But this is straying from the subject. The consequences of defective order are indeed frightful, whether we regard the physical or the moral evils which are produced.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And not less frightful when the political evils are contemplated! To the dangers of an oppressive and iniquitous order, such for example as exists where negro slavery is established, you are fully awake in England; but to those of defective order among yourselves, though they are precisely of the same nature, you are blind. And yet you have spirits among you who are labouring day and night to stir up a bellum servile, an insurrection like that of Wat Tyler, of the Jacquerie, and of the peasants in Germany. There is no provocation for this, as there was in all those dreadful convulsions of society: but there are misery and ignorance and desperate wickedness to work upon, which the want of order has produced. Think for a moment what London, . . nay, what the whole kingdom would be, were your Catilines to succeed in exciting as general an insurrection as that which was raised by one madman in your own childhood! Imagine the infatuated and infuriated wretches, whom not Spitalfields, St. Giles's, and Pimlico alone, but all the lanes and alleys and cellars of the metropolis would pour out; . . a frightful population, whose multitudes, when gathered together, might almost exceed belief! The streets of London would appear to teem with them, like the land of Egypt with its plague of frogs: and the lava floods from a volcano would be less destructive than the hordes whom your great cities and manufacturing districts would vomit forth!

MONTESINOS.

Such an insane rebellion would speedily be crushed.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Perhaps so. But three days were enough for the fire of London. And be assured this would not pass away without leaving in your records a memorial as durable and more dreadful!

MONTESINOS.

Is such an event to be apprehended?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Its possibility at least ought always to be borne in mind. The French Revolution appeared much less possible when the Assembly of Notables was convoked; and the people of France were much less prepared for the career of horrors into which they were presently hurried.

COLLOQUY VI.

WALLA CRAG.—OWEN OF LANARK.

It is no wonder that foreigners, who form their notions of England from what they see in its metropolis, should give such dismal descriptions of an English November; a month, when, according to the received opinion of Continental writers, suicide comes as regularly in season with us as geese at Michaelmas, and green peas in June. Nothing indeed can be more cheerless and comfortless than a common November day in that huge overgrown city; the streets covered with that sort of thick greasy dirt, on which you are in danger of slipping at every step, and the sky concealed from sight by a dense, damp, oppressive, dusky atmosphere, composed of Essex fog and London smoke. But in the country November presents a very different aspect: there its soft, calm weather has a charm of its own; a stillness and serenity unlike any other season, and scarcely less delightful than the most genial days of Spring. The pleasure which it imparts is rather different in kind than inferior in degree: it accords as finely with the feelings of declining life as the bursting foliage and opening flowers of May with the elastic spirits of youth and hope.

But a fine day affects children alike at all seasons as it does the barometer. They live in the present, seldom saddened with any retrospective thoughts, and troubled with no foresight. Three or four days of dull sunless weather had been succeeded by a delicious morning. My young ones were clamorous for a morning's excursion. The glass had risen to a little above change, but their spirits had mounted to the point of settled fair. All things, indeed, animate and inanimate, seemed to partake of the exhilarating influence. The black-birds, who lose so little of their shyness even where they are most secure, made their appearance on the green, where the worms had thrown up little circles of mould during the night. The smaller birds were twittering, hopping from spray to spray, and pluming themselves; and as the temperature had given them a vernal sense of joy, there was something of a vernal cheerfulness in their song. The very flies had come out from their winter quarters, where, to their own danger and my annoyance, they establish themselves behind the books, in the folds of the curtains, and the crevices of these loose window-frames. They were crawling up the sunny panes, bearing in their altered appearance the marks of uncomfortable age; their bodies enlarged, and of a greyer brown; their wings no longer open, clean, and transparent, but closed upon the back, and as it were encrusted with neglect. Some few were beginning to brush themselves, but their motions were slow and feeble: the greater number had fallen upon their backs, and lay unable to recover themselves. Not a breath of air was stirring; the smoke ascended straight into the sky, till it diffused itself equally on all sides and was lost. The lake lay like a mirror, smooth and dark. The tops of the mountains, which had not been visible for many days, were clear and free from snow: a few light clouds, which hovered upon their sides, were slowly rising and melting in the sunshine.

On such a day, a holiday having been voted by acclamation, an ordinary walk would not satisfy the children:..it must be a scramble among the mountains, and I must accompany them;..it would do me good, they knew it would ; ..they knew I did not take sufficient exercise, for they had heard me sometimes say so. One was for Skiddaw Dod, another for Causey Pike, a third proposed Watenlath ; and I, who perhaps would more willingly have sat at home, was yet in a mood to suffer violence, and making a sort of compromise between their exuberant activity and my own inclination for the chair and the fire-side, fixed upon Walla Crag. Never was any determination of sovereign authority more willingly received : it united all suffrages : Oh yes ! yes ! Walla Crag ! was the unanimous reply. Away they went to put on coats and clogs, and presently were ready each with her little basket to carry out the luncheon, and bring home such treasures of mosses and lichens as they were sure to find. Off we set ; and when I beheld their happiness, and thought how many enjoyments they would have been deprived of, if their lot had fallen in a great city, I blest God who had enabled me to fulfil my heart's desire and live in a country such as Cumberland.

The walk on which we had agreed has just that degree of difficulty and enterprize wherein children delight and may safely be indulged. I lived many years at Keswick before I explored it ; but it has since been a favourite excursion with all my guests and resident friends who have been active and robust enough to accomplish the ascent. You leave the Borrodale road about a mile and half from the town, a little before it opens upon the terrace, and, crossing a wall by some stepping stones, go up the wood, having a brook, or what in the language of the country is called a beck, on the right hand. An artist might not long since have found some beautiful studies upon this beck, in its short course through the wood, where its craggy sides were embowered with old trees, the trunks of which, as well as their mossy branches, bent over the water: I scarcely know any place more delightful than this was in a sultry day, for the fine composition of the scene, its refreshing shade and sound, and the sense of deep retirement;—but the woodman has been there! A little higher up you cross a wall and the elbow of a large tree that covers it; you are then upon the side of the open fell, shelving down to the stream, which has worked for itself a narrow ravine below. After a steep ascent you reach one of those loose walls which are common in this country; it runs across the side of the hill, and is broken down in some places; the easier way, or rather the less difficult, is on the inner side, over loose and rugged stones, the wreck of the crags above. They are finely coloured with a yellow or ochrey lichen, which predominates there, to the exclusion of the lichen geographicus: its colour may best be compared to that of beaten or unburnished gold; it is richly blended with the white or silvery kind, and interspersed with the stone-fern or mountain-parsley, the most beautiful of all our wild plants, resembling the richest point lace in its fine filaments and exquisite indentations.

The wall ends at the ravine; just at its termination part of it has been thrown down by the sheep or by the boys, and the view is thus opened from a point which, to borrow a word from the Tourist's Vocabulary is a remarkable station. The stream, which in every other part of its course has worn for itself a deep and narrow channel, flows here for a few yards over a level bed of rock, where in fine weather it might be crossed with ease, then falls immediately into the ravine. A small ash tree bends over the pavement, in such a manner that, if you wish to get into the bed of the stream, you must either stoop under the branches, or stride over them. Looking upward there, the sight is confined between the sides of the mountain, which on the left is steep and stony, and on the right precipitous, except that directly opposite there are some shelves, or rather steps of herbage, and a few birch, more resembling bushes than trees in their size and growth; these, and the mountain rill, broken, flashing, and whitening in its fall where it comes rapidly down, but taking in the level part of its course a colour of delightful green from the rock over which it runs, are the only objects. But on looking back, you behold a scene of the most striking and peculiar character. The water, the rocky pavement, the craggy sides, and the ash tree, form the foreground and the frame of this singular picture. You have then the steep descent, open on one side to the lake, and on the other with the wood, half way down and reaching to the shore; the lower part of Derwentwater below, with its islands; the vale of Keswick, with Skiddaw for its huge boundary and bulwark, to the North; and where Basenthwaite stretches into the open country, a distance of water, hills, and remote horizon, in which Claude would have found all he desired, and more than even he could have represented, had he beheld it in the glory of a midsummer sunset.

This was to be our resting-place, for though the steepest ascent was immediately before us, the greater part of the toil was over. My young companions seated themselves on the fell side, upon some of the larger stones, and there in full enjoyment of air and sunshine opened their baskets and took their noon-day meal, a little before its due time, with appetites which, quickened by exercise, had outstript the hours. My place was on a bough of the ash tree at a little distance, the water flowing at my feet, and the fall just below me. Among all the sights and sounds of Nature there are none which affect me more pleasurably than these. I could sit for hours to watch the motion of a brook: and when I call to mind the happy summer and autumn which I passed at Cintra, in the morning of life and hope, the perpetual gurgling of its tanks and fountains occurs among the vivid recollections of that earthly Paradise as one of its charms.

When I had satisfied myself with the prospect, I took from my waistcoat pocket an Amsterdam edition of the Utopia, given me for its convenient portability by one of my oldest and most valued friends. It is of the year 1629, and is the smallest book in my possession, being not four inches long, and less than two in breadth:.. Mr. Dibdin would shudder to see how some nefarious binder has cut it to the quick. Brief as this little work is, it has introduced into our language a word the meaning of which is understood by thousands and tens of thousands who have never read the fiction from whence it is derived; while volumes upon volumes of metaphysical politics have sunk into the dead pool of oblivion, without raising even a momentary bubble upon its surface. I read till it was time to proceed; and then putting up the book, as I raised my eyes, . . . behold the Author was before me. Let the young ones go forward, said he; they will neither see nor hear me; and if your voice reaches them, they will only suppose that you are muttering verses to yourself. Come, children, I exclaimed, up the hill! and off at the word they set. Presently they were scaling the steepest part of the ascent, where a sheep from the flat countries would have feared to climb; and, before I had got half way up the screes, which gave way and rattled beneath me at every step, they were seated on the brow, looking at the two thin cascades where they fall into the ravine which they have made.

God and good Angels bless them, said Sir Thomas. Of all sights which can soften and humanize the heart of man, there is none that ought so surely to reach it as that of innocent

Of that portion, I replied, these shall never be deprived or curtailed by any act of mine. Whatever may be their allotment in after life, their childhood at least shall be as happy as all wholesome indulgence can render it. You were a lover of children.* I have your word for it in my pocket, . . . nempe reverso domum, cum uxore fabulandum est, garriendum cum liberis. I would rather have heard you talking with them than have listened to your gravest decisions from the bench.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You might have heard more that was worth remembering. The nonsense which was thrown off from an alert fancy and a kind heart would have been more to your liking than grave sense, trammelled with forms, and tortured into the service of litigation. In such hours of holiday feeling you might have seen me derive instruc-

* So also Erasmus describes him, . . . "φιλόστοργος" ut si quis alius . . . Vix alius vivit liberorum amantior . . . And he had a house full of them; his son and his son's wife, his three daughters and their three husbands, and eleven grandchildren, all living with him in the house which he had built at Chelsea.—Erasm. Epist. 1. xxvii. ep. viii. 1506.

tion while I was giving it ; for there are points, and those of no light importance, on which children are the best teachers.

MONTESINOS.

Our great philosophic poet has told us so.
He says to a child,

O dearest, dearest boy ! my heart
For better lore would seldom yearn,
Could I but teach the hundredth part
Of what from thee I learn.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And what have you learnt from them ?

MONTESINOS.

More than metaphysicians could have taught me. And I might say more than divines can teach, could I but learn that entire dependence, that willing and happy obedience, that perfect confidence and love, which the child feels towards its parents ; and which, did we become in this respect like little children, we should feel towards our heavenly Father. If I have not learnt this from them, as I ought to have done, and strive continually to do, I have at least learnt from myself, through their means, the whole import of that appellation, by which in his boundless mercy He has taught and commanded us to call upon him. This lesson is worth all it costs !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Do you look back upon childhood as the happiest part of your own life?

MONTESINOS.

Our recollections of it, I suspect, are not sufficiently unmingled. They hardly reach the age in which perfect security is felt in complete dependence. What that is we must judge rather by observation than reminiscence. This I will say, that of all atrocious doctrines none has ever appeared to me more astonishing than that devilish one concerning infants, which so many divines (more fitly they might be called diabolicals!) have repeated after St. Augustine and St. Ambrose. Alas! that so many are born in sin and the children of wrath, is the consequence of human misgovernment, not of divine appointment. I know not any consideration more mournful than that there should be whole classes in civilized society whom all circumstances tend inevitably to degrade, both in their moral and physical nature. This is the sore disease which seems inherent in civilization; and for which even you and those who have followed you in planning ideal commonwealths, have been able to devise no better remedy, than by supposing that even a perfect society would afford criminals enough to perform all employments of this kind.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Remember, that neither I, nor others, who have framed such schemes of polity, have imagined a Christian Utopia. Under the most complete it may be feared that castaways enough would still be found to discharge whatever unwholesome or disgusting offices were needful. But the progress of the useful arts, and the application of science to the purposes of common life, warrant you in expecting that very few such will remain: and whenever a state shall duly exercise its parental duties, there will surely be none which shall either wholly hebetate the faculties or harden the heart.

MONTESINOS.

The butcher must still continue. And if the slave driver were substituted for the hangman in most cases, (to dream of it in all is folly,) I doubt whether humanity would gain by the substitution.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Have you scruples then concerning the use of animal food?

MONTESINOS.

Certainly not. Its fitness is indicated by the system of nature throughout the inferior world; it is directly permitted by the Scriptures; and, above all, it is authorized by the example of our Lord and Saviour. The law is plainly benevolent which multiplies life by rendering death subservient to it; and it is plainly merciful also, inasmuch as the creatures whose existence is suddenly and violently cut off, suffer less than those who die of disease or inanition,..such being the alternative. Nevertheless I cannot but acknowledge, like good old John Fox, that the sight of a slaughterhouse, or shambles, if it does not disturb this clear conviction, excites in me uneasiness and pain as well as loathing. And that they produce a worse effect upon the persons employed in them, is a fact acknowledged by that law or custom which excludes such persons from sitting in juries upon cases of life or death. Perhaps, however, the hardness of heart which this occupation is believed to produce, may in most cases have been the cause wherefore it was chosen.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

There methinks you are mistaken. Such things are determined less by choice than by opportunity; and youths, even in higher life, are more frequently disposed of where situations can be found, than where their own inclinations would lead them. Moreover, though you have nothing like casts in your institutions, there is some tendency toward them in the ordinary course of affairs. The humbler trades, those in particular which afford little more than a bare livelihood, naturally become hereditary: the son, when he is a child, imitates his father, assists him as soon as he is able, and finally succeeds him. In these cases disposition is not consulted; and even if it were, you have imputed to hardness of heart what may be ascribed to that hardihood which is one of the characteristics of man.

MONTESINOS.

I am glad you have not called it courage: it hardly deserves even the appellation which you have given it. The best answer, however, to what I was unthinkingly disposed to credit, is, that the men engaged in this occupation are not found to furnish more than their numerical proportion of offenders to the criminal list; and that, as a body, they are by no means worse than any other set of men upon the same level. I have heard Dr. Beddoes remark that pulmonary consumption is rarely or never known to occur in a butcher's family; and the reason he assigned for this was, that they had always plenty of animal food. The same cause operates upon the moral as upon the physical character, and perhaps more surely. Because they are well fed, they are not exposed to the temptation which necessity brings with it,..the mother of crimes as well as of arts; and their occupation being constant, they are likewise safe from the dangers of idleness. The relation too in which they stand to their customers places them in a salutary degree of dependence, and makes them understand how much their own welfare depends upon civility and good conduct.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

This is the very point to which I would have brought you. You have thus yourself remarked that men who exercise the occupation which, of all others, at first sight appears most injurious to the human heart, and which inevitably must in some degree injure it, are in point of fact no worse than their neighbours, and very much better than the vagrant classes of the populace, and than those whose employment is casual. They are better, because they fare better, and are more under the influence of order. Improve the condition of others, bring them within the sphere of order, instead of leaving them merely within the reach,..the chance reach,..almost it may be called, of vindictive law, and the result will be the same.

MONTESINOS.

But how is this to be effected? Announce the speedy Restoration of the Jews, and you will find believers. Preach up the duty of converting the Turks, and you may form a society for that express purpose. But if you propose to render civilization complete by extending it to those classes who are brutalized by the institutions of society, half the persons whom you address will ask how this is to begin? and the other half, where it is to end? Undoubtedly both are grave questions. Owen of Lanark indeed would answer both: but because he promises too much, no trial is made of the good which his schemes might probably perform.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In your opinion then he has shown how the beginning might be made.

MONTESINOS.

If I were his countryman, I would class him in a triad as one of the three men who have in this generation given an impulse to the moral world. Clarkson and Dr. Bell are the other two. They have seen the first fruits of their harvest. So I think would Owen ere this, if he had not alarmed the better part of the nation by proclaiming, upon the most momentous of all subjects, opinions which are alike fatal to individual happiness and to the general good. Yet I admire the man ; and readily admit that his charity is a better plank than the faith of an intolerant and bitter-minded bigot, who, as Warburton says, ‘ counterworks his Creator, makes God after man’s image, and chooses the worst model he can find, . . himself !’

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You must, however, acknowledge that the prejudice which he has thus excited against his political speculations, is not unfounded : for the connection between moral truth and political wisdom is close and indissoluble ; and he who shows himself grievously erroneous upon one important point, must look to have his opinions properly distrusted upon others. To maintain that the state ought not to concern itself with the religion of the subjects is the greatest and most perilous of all political errors : and to regard religion with indifference is the most dangerous of all moral ones ; . . if indeed in any case that may be called an error, which assuredly in most is less a mistake of the understanding than a sin of the will.

MONTESINOS.

A craniologist, I dare say, would pronounce that the organ of theopathy is wanting in Owen's head, that of benevolence being so large as to have left no room for it.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Away with such systems! Where there is most love of God, there will there be the truest and most enlarged philanthropy. No other foundation is secure. There is no other means whereby nations can be reformed, than that by which alone individuals can be regenerated. In the laws of God conscience is made the basis of policy; and in proportion as human laws depart from that groundwork, error and evil are the sure result.

MONTESINOS.

So Lord Brooke teaches, the wisest man that ever uttered dark sayings in verse. National happiness must be produced through the influence of religious laws. There is nothing, however, in the practical part of Owen's polity to exclude them; and indeed so far as his scheme of society might easily and beneficially be put in execution, it would strengthen their influence; its purport and effect being

That private hearts may unto public ends
Still governed be by order's easy reins.

A set of journeymen in London endeavoured to make the attempt. They were chiefly printers. A committee was appointed to digest their plan, and the Report which they put forth upon the subject was worthy of more attention than it obtained. In this report they declared themselves fully persuaded that by combining their industry, their skill and their mental faculties, they should not merely bid defiance to poverty, but secure a competency of the goods of life, a great accession of intellectual enjoyments and rational amusements, and, above all, the means of giving their children an education which would ensure them an adequate portion of useful knowledge, and confirm them in virtuous habits. Clubs and Friendly Societies, they said, had made them familiar with the blessed effects of union; and they were certain that by thus uniting they should obtain the power of creating new wealth for themselves, procure a larger quantity of the means of subsistence for the same money, and enable their wives to perform their domestic duties more skilfully and in half the time which those occupations now required. They calculated upon an average saving of one fourth per cent. by purchasing articles for the community in wholesale: upon a saving of time not less advantageous, by a proper distribution of domestic occupations, and upon the benefit of avoiding waste by having at hand all conveniences and facilities for economy. For the children large school-rooms were to be provided, (appropriable to other purposes after school hours,) and a large playground, which would keep them from the accidents and temptations of the streets. Constant superintendence was to be exercised over them, by changing the teachers every three hours; and they hoped to unite the advantages of public and private education, the children being at all times accessible to their parents, and constantly with them at certain times of the day. For themselves, their dwellings would be more commodious, their food better, their habits cleaner: and their wives, not being worn down by over exertion, nor by the distraction of conflicting duties, would become better companions, and be better fitted to participate in innocent recreations. The establishment would in reality be a College of useful arts: it would have its lectures, its library, its infirmary, and its medical practitioners.

The result of their estimates was, that a saving of 7,780*l. per annum* might be effected by means of the proposed plan upon the expenditure of 250 families, averaging four persons in a family; and that if each adult male member paid one guinea per week to the general fund, the collective sum would provide the whole establishment with all the necessaries and many of the comforts of life in abundance, besides furnishing a capital for the purposes of production and traffic. Some objections they anticipated, and first, the difficulty of making so many persons agree and act cordially together. To this they allowed little weight, the only condition which they required upon admission being a formal acknowledgment of this maxim, that while every member had a right to do separately for himself whatever he could, without trespassing upon others, it was his duty to do as much as he could, without injury to himself, for the benefit and comfort of the society. So plain a proposition, they thought, was not likely to be contravened : and if it were, every adult member might quit the society when he pleased ; and the majority of course possessed the power of expelling any individual who disturbed its peace, either paying him the fair value of his share in the permanent stock, or allowing him to sell out. A second objection was, that under such a system, the poor, the indolent and inefficient would fare as well as the more wealthy, industrious and useful. But the answer to this was, that a community of goods was not what they proposed : their plan of association rather resembled that of regimental messes ; and as the contributions were to be regulated according to the means of those who could afford least, such as could afford more indulgences might have them at their own expense. As for any misdirection or mal-administration of the funds, that must be provided against, as in other cases, by regular inspection. And for the injury which the small retail trade would suffer if such plans were generally adopted, it would be so gradual that it could hardly be called an evil: the general expenditure would be increased rather than diminished, and the retail dealer would find other modes of life. Lastly, the increase of population was objected, as a consequence which must follow from the success of such plans, and aggravate the miseries of posterity. But they repelled this argument with just indignation, and maintained that if a taste for comfort could be diffused over the whole community, it would constitute a much more effectual check upon excessive population than the misery which results from blind improvidence ever has, or ever can be expected to do.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Enough of the theory. Let us hear how it proved in practice.

MONTESINOS.

There was a difficulty in the way which was not so easily obviated as the theoretical objections. London, which furnishes facilities for most things, affords none for an experiment of this kind. Space was wanted, and buildings adapted for the intended manner of life. The speculators proposed to raise 12,000*l.* in shares of 100*l.* each, and with the money to erect a quadrangle according to Mr. Owen's designs; the property of the buildings was to be vested in the shareholders, and the society to pay a rental of 7½ per cent. The capital was not forthcoming. The experiment was commenced with insufficient means, and under circumstances every way inconvenient. Of necessity, therefore, it failed; and then the failure was imputed to the impracticability of the scheme, whereas, had it been fairly set in action, it could hardly have failed to work well.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Still in Utopia! Would you think thus favourably of the scheme, if it did not in some degree accord with the dreams of your youth?

MONTESINOS.

That consideration is more likely to put me on my guard against illusion. But though Owen's views evidently tend to an entire community of goods, and these speculators looked to such a result of their experiment as possible, and as a consummation devoutly to be wished, they did not propose to go this length. What they aimed at was plainly practicable if it could have been fairly started, and the direct results must have been of unquestionable advantage to themselves, and utility to the commonwealth.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

A community of goods, you imply then, would be productive of good to neither?

MONTESINOS.

Theory and experience are alike against it. The Jesuits are the only persons who ever made the experiment upon an adequate scale, and, well as they succeeded in Paraguay, the result did not induce them to establish their later missions upon the same foundation.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Was the fault in the system, or in the Jesuits? Surely they set their standard so low that no inference against the principle of such a polity can be drawn from the result.

MONTESINOS.

The standard was the same in the Chiquito as in the Paraguay Reductions. They may more properly be said to have aimed at taming and domesticating the savages than at civilizing them. But in the course of their experience they perceived that the disposition to have and to hold is the main spring of all improvements in society ; and the desire of increasing their comforts and enjoyments called forth in the Chiquitos a degree of active and intelligent industry to which the Guaranis, notwithstanding the advantage of a much earlier settlement, never attained. But this is a wide excursion. Let us return from the Guapore and the Uruguay to the Thames.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

What then are the advantages, which, according to your view of the subject, might be expected from the Owenite plan, modified as you think it ought to be ?

MONTESINOS.

To the individuals so associated, I am persuaded the benefit would not fall short of what these speculators proposed to themselves. And to society at large, there would be the great and unequivocal good of exalting one whole class, and that a numerous one, .. bettering their condition in every way, moral and physical, .. increasing their respectability, their comforts, their means and their expenditure. This further advantage would arise, that, as no person would be admitted into such a community unless his character would bear inquiry, nor be allowed to continue in it if he deserved expulsion, the members would virtually be bound to their good behaviour : and the evil of a defective order would be remedied as far as such associations might extend. The effect even of the Saxon law would thus in a great degree be brought about, and that without the slightest intrenchment upon individual freedom, and in all respects unexceptionably.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Something of this might be effected more easily by making your parochial government more efficient ; that is, by making it what it ought to be, and indeed what it originally was.

MONTESINOS.

A parish is in itself a little commonwealth ; but in these little governments, as in some great ones, though the machinery exists and is kept up, it no longer works according to its original design. What you have indicated is certainly one practicable means of producing great improvement where it is most needed ; so it is perceived to be, and so it will one day be made. But the best parochial police must fall far short of effecting what these voluntary associations might accomplish. The difficulty is that which Archimedes felt : a place is wanted where to plant the machine ; and in London this difficulty is almost insuperable. In a provincial town the experiment might more easily be made; but funds for the first outlay are not likely to be forthcoming. Large sums are sometimes bequeathed by humorists in strange ways, . . . to odd purposes more frequently than to useful ones. That such a chance may occur in this case is barely possible. It is somewhat less unlikely that capital may be embarked in it as a speculation, when no other means of employing it are at hand. And perhaps it is even probable that the principle may be taken up by some religious enthusiast, as the foundation for a new sect.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In that case the evil would be greater than the good. The fanatics who should set out on such a principle would soon find themselves on the road to Munster.

{MONTESINOS.

I think not. The Moravians on the continent carry it farther than we are now contemplating; and yet they are an inoffensive, and even, in some respects, an exemplary people; so much so, that in spite of the obloquy which they provoked at their outset, no sect has ever in so great a degree enjoyed and deserved the good will and good opinion of all other Christian communities.

There are more points of resemblance between Geneva and Rome, than between Hernnhut and Munster. The danger in these days is not from religious fanaticism, but from the fanaticism of impiety.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The one generates the other, and the state of things with you affords opportunity and encouragement for both. But wherefore do you think that the Owenite scheme is likely to be carried into effect only by sectarian agency?

MONTESINOS.

Because a degree of generous and virtuous excitement is required for overcoming the first difficulties, which nothing but religious feeling can call forth. With all Owen's efforts and all his eloquence, (and there are few men who speak better, or who write so well,) he has not been able in ten years to raise funds for trying his experiment: while during that time the Bible Society has every year levied large contributions upon the public, and more than once a larger sum within the year than he has asked for. Had he connected his scheme with any system of belief, though it had been as visionary as Swedenborgianism, as fabulous as Popery, as monstrous as Calvinism, as absurd as the dreams of Joanna Southcote, .. or perhaps even as cold as Unitarianism, the money would have been forthcoming.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And surely it is honourable to human nature that it should be so!

MONTESINOS.

How? honourable to human nature that we should be acted upon more powerfully by error and delusion, than by a reasonable prospect of direct and tangible benefit to ourselves and others?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Say rather that what is spiritual affects men more than what is material; that they seek more ardently after ideal good than after palpable and perishable realities. This is honourable to your nature; and no man will ever be ranked among the great benefactors of his species unless he feels and understands this truth and acts upon it. Upon this ground it is that the moral Archimedes must take his stand. We must take wider views of the subject. For the present I leave you to your young companions, who are waiting yonder with expectation in their looks.

By this time we had nearly past over the fell, and had begun to descend upon Castlerigg. The children had halted beside a rocky basin in the mountain-stream, to remind me of a sight which we had once enjoyed there, and to enjoy it again in recollection. It was a flock of geese who in the bright sunshine of a summer's day were sporting in that basin, and with such evident joyousness that it was a pleasure to behold their joy. Sometimes they thrust their long necks under the water straight down, and turned up their broad yellow feet ; sometimes rose half up, shaking and clapping their wings ; sometimes with retorted head pruned themselves as they floated. Their motion did not in the slightest degree defile the water ; for there was no soil to disturb ; the stream, flowing from its mountain-springs, over a bed of rock, had contracted no impurity in its course, and these birds were so delicately clean that they could not sully it ; the few feathers which they plucked or shook off were presently carried away by the current. It was the most beautiful scene of animal enjoyment that I ever beheld, or ever shall behold : the wildness of the spot, the soft green turf upon the bank, the beauty of that basin, (and they only who have seen mountain-streams in a country of clear waters can imagine how beautiful such basins are,) the colour of the stream, which acquired a chrysolite tinge from the rock over which it ran, and the dazzling whiteness of the birds, heightened by the sunshine, composed a picture, which like that of Wordsworth's daffodils, when it has once been seen, the inward eye can re-create, but which no painter could represent. Our dear N. felt this, and regretted the impossibility of preserving any adequate representation of what he declared to be the most striking and beautiful incident he had ever the good fortune to behold. I thought of the story in Musæus's Tales, (a fiction known to the Arabians as well as the Germans,) and had they been swans instead of geese, could almost have fancied they were Fairies in that form, and have looked about for a veil.

COLLOQUY VII.

THE MANUFACTURING SYSTEM.

FRANKLIN, who of all philosophers seems to have possessed the greatest share of good, practical, every-day sense, (and the least of comprehensive philosophy,) has written a playful essay upon early rising, wherein he assures his readers that the sun actually appears during the greater part of the year many hours before they are in the habit of leaving their beds ; and he endeavours to convince them that it would be worth their while to profit by this discovery, and save the expense of candles in the evening by making use of the early daylight. In this instance he has well applied his favourite principle of trying every thing by the rule of profit and loss, . . a principle which he has been but too successful in impressing upon his countrymen. Wesley has published an excellent sermon upon the same subject. The better to enforce his precepts, he required his preachers to hold forth at five in the morning, and expected his people to attend them.

Whoever has tasted the breath of morning, knows that the most invigorating and most delightful hours of the day are commonly spent in bed, though it is the evident intention of nature that we should enjoy and profit by them. Children awake early and would be up and stirring long before the arrangements of the family permit them to use their limbs. We are thus broken in from childhood to an injurious habit; and yet were we not necessarily the slaves of society, that habit might be shaken off with more ease than it was imposed. We rise with the sun at Christmas; it were but continuing so to do till the middle of April, and without any perceptible change we should find ourselves then rising at five o'clock; at which hour we might continue till September, and then accommodate ourselves again to the change of season, regulating always the time of retiring in the same proportion. They who require eight hours sleep would upon such a system go to bed at nine during four months. The propriety and the easiness of such an arrangement cannot be disputed; I confess, however, that my mode of life, independent as it is, is not independent enough for me to follow it. ‘ Inter causas malorum nostro-

*'rum est, quod vivimus ad exempla : nec ratione
' componimur, sed consuetudine abducimur.'*

But though not habitually an early riser, few men in my rank of life have made more use of the morning hours, for composition, or for exercise, as the weather or inclination might determine. I had risen with the sun on one of those days toward the end of November which might make winter welcome, if we did not know what a tremendous artillery must be expected in his train. It had frozen during the night hard enough to dry the roads. A mist lay over the lake and extended along the foot of the mountains, which were covered nearly halfway down with new-fallen snow. The first rosy light shone upon their summits; and above was the blue sky, cold and clear.

Starting for Appelthwaite at a cold-weather pace, .. which for one of the Longshanks family is nearer five miles an hour than four, .. I perceived Sir Thomas on the bridge. He was standing in the sunshine, but his body cast no shadow; and while my own breathing was visible at every expiration in the frosty air, there was no such indication of the breath of life in his nostrils. At the moment when I joined him a cock crew. You are a good Ghost, said I, to come at cock-crow instead of taking your departure at that sound. Why is it that, according to popular belief, such apparitions occur only during the night?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It will be a sufficient answer if I reply that the visible world is then as it were withdrawn, and men being left to themselves and to their own hearts, are in a fitter state for communion with spiritual intelligences. Night is therefore the likelier season for a real appearance; the imagination is also obviously at that time more apt and more able to delude itself with an ideal one; and you must be well aware that where one relation of this kind is true, five hundred fictitious ones have been invented by falsehood and by fear. Were such communion* frequent,

* The reader may be pleased to see Sir Thomas More's opinion upon this subject in his own words. He says, ' Surely in this world the goodnes of God so temperyth such apparycyons, as hys hygh wysedom seeth yt most profytable for help and reliefe of the dede, and instruccyon and amendment of the quyck: kepynge suche apparecyons of hys great marcy most comenly from the syght of such as wold turn hys goodnes in to theyre owne harme. And surely of hys tender favoure toward you, doth hys great goodnes provyde that such apparycyons, revelacyons and myracles shold not be to copenouse and commune; whereby good men seyng the thyng at eye, should lese the great parte of that they now meryte by fayth; and evyll folke when they were onys famelyer wyth yt, wolde then as lytle regard yt, as they now lytle beleve it.'—Supplicacyon of Soulys, ff. 33.

or even if it took place as often in daylight as in solitude and darkness, the constitution of the world would be changed.

MONTESINOS.

And must it not be changed before it can be perfected ?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Perfected ! perfection in what is mutable and perishable !

MONTESINOS.

Perfect according to its capacity of perfection. Will it never again be as it was in the beginning, when Angels came to and fro between Heaven and Earth, and the Creator made himself visible to his servants ?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Visible the Creator is to those who have eyes, and can see. He whose faith is what it ought to be hath Heaven within him and about him ; and why should he be impatient for the society of angels who knows that the longest life must soon appear like a tale that is told, and that before the passing hour is at an end, he may be in Paradise ? A direct communion with higher intelligences would unfit men for the cares and ordinary business of their earthly state. If I appear to you notwithstanding, it is because nothing could make you more unfit for the common affairs of the world than you are already; and that alone for which you are qualified, it is the object of these visits to promote.

MONTESINOS.

Enable me to impress upon my fellow creatures one wholesome truth with effect, and you will indeed be to me more than a great Apollo.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You would see as little of me as of Apollo if I thought that the desire of immediate effect produced in you anything like impatience, or disappointment. To you and to all, I say, look forward! To governments, inquire concerning the tendency and consequences of the course you are pursuing, the institutions which you are supporting, the alterations which you are about to make! For if any of the imperfections of men could now fill me with surprise, it would be their want of foresight. Beasts, birds and insects, even to the minutest and meanest of their kind, act with the unerring providence of instinct; man, the while, who possesses a higher faculty, abuses it, and therefore goes blundering on. They, by their unconscious and unhesitating obedience to the laws of nature, fulfil the end of their existence; he, in wilful neglect of the laws of God, loses sight of the end of his. Enemy as you are, Montesinos, to the Romish system, you must confess that, amidst all its corruptions, in the age of its darkest ignorance and foulest frauds, this object was kept in view, better than it has ever been in any country calling itself Reformed.

MONTESINOS.

'Calling itself reformed!' I did not expect to hear the phraseology of a papist from the lips of one to whom the veil has been lifted up!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

There are neither Papists nor Protestants in the state to which I belong: we are one flock there, under one shepherd. In some things, and those essential ones, the Protestants brought back a corrupted faith to its primitive purity. But it is not less certain that the Reformation has, in its consequences, lowered the standard of devotion, lessened the influence of religion, not among the poor and ignorant alone, but among all classes; and prepared the way for the uncontrolled dominion of that worldly spirit which it is the tendency of the commercial system to produce and foster.

MONTESINOS.

How can that Reformation have lowered devotion, which has withdrawn it from stocks and stones, relics, beads, girdles, and scapularies, polytheism and idolatry?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You have taken all this from those persons whose religion goes no farther, and you have substituted nothing in its place. That the wiser and better Papists, though they may use some of these things as incentives to devotion, worship the Father in spirit and in truth, is what none but the blindest bigots would deny, and what no Protestant has ever acknowledged more amply than yourself. I admit that these things are often a hinderance; and you cannot deny that they are sometimes a help. But it was not of such practices that I spake. Before your Reformation, the momentous truth that the improvement of his moral and spiritual condition ought to be the first concern of every intellectual creature, was impressed upon the people by example, as well as by precept. It is still preached from your pulpits, but where is the practice to be found? The Religious Orders, with all their abuses, brought this truth home to the feelings of mankind. Among you, such as might desire to join in devotional exercises, or take an active part in works of painful beneficence, must overcome the fear of ridicule at the outset, and be content to associate with those who bear the reproach of enthusiasm and who very generally deserve it. In Roman Catholic countries they would be encouraged by public opinion. The churches there are at all times open, and enter them when you will, you find some one intently employed in solitary prayer.

MONTESINOS.

Are not those persons usually reciting prayers which have been imposed in penance, and therefore engaged in the practice of a very mischievous superstition?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Even then the very act of performance implies a sense of religion, and tends to strengthen it. Is it not better that men should perform good works even from a vain trust in them, than rest contented with the non-performance in a belief that good works are not to be relied on? Religion may be neglected in Roman Catholic countries, but it cannot be forgotten ; it is impressed upon the senses of the people ; travel where they will its symbols are perpetually presented to them. They see the Cross or the Crucifix, not in towns and villages alone, but in lonely places and by the way-side. The open shrine invites them to an act of devotion as wholesome as it is transitory ; and the vesper bell unites them with all their brethren wherever dispersed, at one hour, in one act of adoration. You have lost more by abolishing that vesper bell, than you have gained by rejecting the creature-worship wherewith the observance was connected.

MONTESINOS.

Far be it from me to deny that in the Reformation the plough and the harrow were sometimes used, where careful weeding only was wanted. Yet if it be your intention to prove that the influence of religion is less in the reformed countries than in those where the corruptions of Popery maintain their ground, or that the people are less moral when left to the tribunal of their consciences, than when under the dominion of the confessional, your arguments must indeed be cogent before they persuade me that you are really serious.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In spite of the Confessional and of the Casuists, and of the abominations which they generate, what I affirm is true, that the standard both of devotion and of morals is higher in the Romish than in the Protestant countries. Proof of this appears in the existence of a class of men, recognized by the laws, and respected by public opinion, who profess to make preparation for the next world their sole business in this, and voluntarily to lead a life of poverty and privations for that purpose. The principle may be carried to an extravagant and pitiable excess ; the practice may be converted into a cover for ambition, or for meaner passions ; . . I allow even that while the errors and abuses with which these orders are connected, remain in force, the direct evil which arises from them is greater than the good. But the indirect good must not be undervalued : for while the principle is thus publicly and practically recognized, Mammon can never acquire that undisputed and acknowledged supremacy which he seems to have obtained in commercial countries, and in no country more decidedly than in this. The spirit which built and endowed monasteries is gone. Are you one of those persons who think it has been superseded for the better by that which erects steam-engines and cotton-mills ?

MONTESINOS.

They are indeed miserable politicians who mistake wealth for welfare in their estimate of national prosperity ; and none have committed this great error more egregiously than some of those who have been called statesmen by the courtesy of England. Yet the manufacturing system is a necessary stage in the progress of society. Without it this nation could not have supported the long and tremendous conflict which has delivered Europe from the yoke of military despotism, . . the worst of all evils. If England had not been enabled by the use of steam-engines to send out every year myriads of brave men, and millions of specie, . . what had Europe, and what had England itself been now? This inestimable benefit we have seen and felt. And from the consequences of that skill in machinery which the manufacturing system alone could have produced, we may expect ultimately to obtain the greatest advantages of science and civilization at the least expense of human labour.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Sir Poet, travel not so hastily in your speculations! There is a wide gulph between you and that point, and it is not to be crost by one of these flying leaps in seven-leagued boots. Neither are you to expect that, when you reach the brink, a bridge will grow before your way as it did upon Kehama's triumphal entrance into Padalon. . . . If you ask me how I became acquainted with the adventures of that personage, I will tell you that I amuse myself sometimes in the Limbo where are to be found

'all things vain,

Abortive, monstrous, or unkindly mix'd.'

MONTESINOS.

What a happiness is in store for the collectors when they get there!... True it is that a long time must elapse before we double the Cape of Good Hope for which we are bound, and that the navigation thither is unknown, for we are sailing in a sea of which there are no charts to direct our course.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Why then do you give the name of Good Hope to a point which may deserve to be called the Cape of Storms?

MONTESINOS.

Not in the expectation that we shall reach it by carrying easy sail all the way with a trade-wind; but in the belief that good principles will more and more prevail, and that, when their ascendancy is complete, it will then be seen how all things have been ordered for the best: and the benefit will remain after all the evils of the process shall have passed away.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Is it not rather the tendency of evil to generate evil? Famine is produced by war, and pestilence by famine. There are countries in which, their prosperity having been destroyed by violence and tyranny, or by long misrule, agriculture is ruined, and earth being neglected infects the air, and brings forth disease and death. In the moral, as in the physical world, thus also evil produces evil.

MONTESINOS.

In both cases as a punishment and a warning.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

A punishment assuredly, . . . the bitter fruit of error and of sin : but where is the people that hath ever yet been warned by it? This very manufacturing system, which you regard as introductory to your Utopian era, proves that England has taken no warning.

MONTESINOS.

Where should it be found? for in this case history affords no lessons. It contains no parallel to the present condition of Europe, and more especially of these kingdoms.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Let us see if there be not some principles, which, if kept steadily in view, might serve as a cynosure to direct you in this unknown navigation. You have lived long enough in the world to know something, both by experience and observation, of the course of human affairs. Setting aside the chances, as they are called, of health and fortune, did you ever know any one fail of happiness, except through some indiscretion or error of his own?

MONTESINOS.

The exceptions are large, and a heavy drawback must be allowed for them. But taking them into the account, I can truly answer that, within the circle of my knowledge, those persons have been the happiest who have best deserved to be so. They have had most enjoyment in prosperity, have struggled best with difficulties, and borne affliction with the wisest spirit and the truest resignation. Some indeed I have known who, amid the privations inseparable from scanty means, or under bodily affliction, or the sorer pressure of worldly and inevitable cares, have yet been objects of admiration and example rather than compassion, because their minds were well regulated, and they were in the enjoyment of that peace which passeth all understanding.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And which have been the most prosperous, the upright, or the worldly wise?

MONTESINOS.

I see the worldling flourish like a tree planted by the water side, and his leaf does not wither.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But is the fruit of happiness brought forth there in due season?

MONTESINOS.

There are many sorts of happiness. The Geologist does not plod over these mountains with more patience, hammer in hand, when tracing where the slate demarcation ends and the sienite begins, speculating the while upon the formation of mountains and the manufactory of worlds, than the sportsman with his fowling-piece on his shoulder, whose greatest ambition is to tell of the birds that he has bagged. The great capitalist, when he adds some score of thousands to his enormous wealth, envies me for adding to my treasures a book long sought and brought from afar, as little as I envy him. Gryll will 'be Gryll and have his hoggish mind.' And Tom Fool is as happy in the company of Jack a Dandy, as I have been when conversing with C., or W., or R., or Walter Landor. Each has his fill of enjoyment; and if there are few who have an after-taste of it when they chew the cud, it is because the ruminating portion of the human species is but a small variety.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Montesinos, that reply is a rambling one. Mere transient enjoyment is not to be taken into the account of happiness for an intellectual and immortal being. That man alone can be called happy who is at peace with his own heart and with his Maker. Your own observation must have shown you that those whose desires are regulated by wisdom, and whose course of life is what it ought to be, seldom have reason to complain of fortune. This country is not yet so corrupted, even with all the efforts which are made to corrupt it, and all the causes which are at work to increase its corruption, but that good conduct and good character pass in it for their just value. Is it not so? Have you not just acknowledged that, in the circle of your own immediate friends, the best men are the happiest?

MONTESINOS.

It is strictly and righteously so.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And it is strictly and righteously otherwise with those whose desires are inordinate; or who, following the pursuit of wealth or power, devote themselves to those objects with all their heart, and with all their soul; and with all their strength. Success brings with it no happiness to them; and age makes them feel the worthlessness of such pursuits as surely as it overtakes them.

MONTESINOS.

If they could learn by others to be wise,
If once they could the golden mean embrace,
Or banish quite ambition from their breast,
They never need to reck or reap unrest.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Thus poets have sung, and moralists have taught, and preachers have proclaimed from the pulpit. But of what avail are precepts, when the whole tendency of your institutions, and the whole practice of society, counteract them? The object of a good and wise man in this transitory state of existence should be to fit himself for a better, by controlling the unworthy propensities of his nature, and improving all its better aspirations; . . to do his duty first to his family, then to his neighbours, lastly to his country and his kind; to promote the welfare and happiness of those who are in any degree dependent upon him, or whom he has the means of assisting, and never wantonly to injure the meanest thing that lives; to encourage, as far as he may have the power, whatever is useful and ornamental in society, whatever tends to refine and elevate humanity; to store his mind with such knowledge as it is fitted to receive, and he is able to attain; and so to employ the talents committed to his charge, that when the account is required, he may hope to have his stewardship approved. It should not seem difficult to do this: for nothing can be more evident than that men are and must be happy in proportion as their lives are conformed to such a scheme of divine philosophy. And yet think you that there are ten men in a generation who act thus ?

MONTESINOS.

God be merciful to us ! We are unprofitable servants at the best. Yet there is much that may be pleaded, and something assuredly I trust that will be admitted in our excuse. It is not always willingly, or from temptation that we go astray. Society has an original sin in its constitution, as certain as the mysterious disease of human nature. We are born and bred in it, and from the highest to the lowest, even those whose disposition would lead them to better things, are put out from childhood and as it were bound over to the service of the world !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

There is an example before our eyes. Yonder children are on the way to a manufactory, where they pass six days out of the seven, from morning till night. Is it likely that the little they learn at school on the seventh, (which ought to be their day of recreation as well as rest,) should counteract the effects of such an education, when the moral atmosphere wherein they live and move and have their being, is as noxious to the soul, as the foul and tainted air which they inhale is to their bodily constitution ?

MONTESINOS.

Yet the most celebrated minister of the age, the only minister who for many generations has deserved to be called a Premier, the minister whom our best and wisest statesmen at this day profess entirely to admire and implicitly to follow, . . he made his boast of this very evil, and congratulated Parliament that the nation had a new source of wealth and revenue in the labour of children : so completely had the political system in which he was trained up seared his heart and obscured his understanding.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Confess that this is an evil which had no existence in former times ! There are new things under the sun, . . new miseries, . . new enormities, . . this portentous age produces them,

partimque figuras

Rettulit antiquas, partim nova monstra creavit.

MONTESINOS.

This evil, however, existed long ago to a considerable degree in the Low Countries. It is Sueyro's remark that, when Count Baldwin the Young, in the tenth century, established the weavers and clothiers in Ghent, he laid the foundation of that city's wealth and prosperity ; but prepared at the same time the seed-bed of those commotions* which made it during some ages the most turbulent city in Christendom.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The history of the Low Countries down to their fatal connection with the House of Austria, deserves to be treated by some one who, with the minute diligence of an antiquary, should unite the comprehensiveness of a philosophic mind. Manufactures in those times produced more good than evil, . . for the men whom they brutalized in one way, would have been brutalized in another and a worse by the warlike spirit of the age. They raised up a civic and pacific interest; and even their strong democratic tendency was favourable to the improvement of Europe. The modern system possesses this tendency in a much greater degree, when it has become altogether dangerous. It is also essentially different and essentially worse. Large properties were in former times carved out with the sword, and founded upon the right of conquest. Are those fortunes raised on a better foundation which are derived from a system like this? . . from slavery direct or indirect, abroad or at home? . . . from the sweat and blood of black or brown slaves, working under the whip? or from the degradation in body and soul of those who, though white by complexion, and free by birth, are nevertheless in an actual state of servitude?

MONTESINOS.

Bad enough to serve the planter for a parallel and an excuse! There is a nation of warriors in Hindostan who call their deity All-Steel. Commercial nations, if they acknowledged the deity whom they serve, might call him All-Gold. And if the sum of their sacrifices were compared, Mammon would be found a more merciless fiend than Moloch.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The servants of Mammon are however wiser in their generation than the children of light. They serve a master who rewards them.

MONTESINOS.

They pursue their object with steadiness and singleness of purpose, and rewarded they are abundantly with what they covet. Yet their power of creating wealth brings with it a consequence not dissimilar to that which Midas suffered. The love of lucre is one of those base passions which harden all within,

And petrify the feeling.

He who, at the beginning of his career, uses his fellow-creatures as bodily machines for producing wealth, ends not unfrequently in becoming an intellectual one himself, employed in continually increasing what it is impossible for him to enjoy.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

What then shall we say of a system which in its direct consequences debases all who are engaged in it? a system that employs men unremittingly in pursuits unwholesome for the body, and unprofitable for the mind, . . . a system in which the means are so bad, that any result would be dearly purchased at such an expense of human misery and degradation, and the end so fearful, that the worst calamities which society has hitherto endured may be deemed light in comparison with it?

MONTESINOS.

Like the whole fabric of our society it has been the growth of circumstances, not a system foreplanned, foreseen and deliberately chosen. Such as it is we have inherited it, . . . or rather have fallen into it, and must get out of it as well as we can. We must do our best to remove its evils, and to mitigate them while they last, and to modify and reduce it till only so much remains as is indispensable for the general good.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The facts will not warrant you in saying that it has come upon the country unsought and unforeseen. You have prided yourselves upon this system, you have used every means for extending it; you have made it the measure of your national prosperity. It is a wen, a fungous excrescence from the body politic: the growth might have been checked if the consequences had been apprehended in time; but now it has acquired so great a bulk, its nerves have branched so widely, and the vessels of the tumour are so inosculated into some of the principal veins and arteries of the natural system, that to remove it by absorption is impossible, and excision would be fatal.

MONTESINOS.

Happily, this is but a metaphor; and the body politic, like its crowned head, never dies.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But as there are evils worse than death for individuals, so are there calamities for a people worse than extermination. The Jews, during a full millennium, might have envied the lot of the Carthaginians; and even at this day the great body of that extraordinary and miraculously preserved people would have cause to regret that a remnant had been spared, were it not for the hope of Israel.

MONTESINOS.

We shall work our way through this evil, as we have done through others.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

What others?

MONTESINOS.

The late war, for example, during which, though my heart never quailed, there were few who did not tremble for the result.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The case is not in point. You were in the right course, and had only to persevere bravely and virtuously to the end.

MONTESINOS.

The religious troubles which commenced in your days; the political convulsions during the Great Rebellion; and the Revolution.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Have you yet seen the termination of either?

PART II.

MANUFACTURING SYSTEM.—NATIONAL WEALTH.

By this time we had reached the bank above Applethwaite. The last question of my companion was one to which I could make no reply, and as he neither talked for triumph, nor I endeavoured to elude the force of his argument, we remained awhile in silence, looking upon the assemblage of dwellings below. Here, and in the adjoining hamlet of Millbeck, the effects of manufactures and of agriculture may be seen and compared. The old cottages are such as the poet and the painter equally delight in beholding. Substantially built of the native stone without mortar, dirtied with no white-lime, and their long low roofs covered with slate, if they had been raised by the magic of some indigenous Amphion's music, the materials could not have adjusted themselves more beautifully in accord with the surrounding scene; and time has still farther harmonized them with weather stains, lichens and moss, short grasses and short fern, and stone plants of various kinds. The ornamented chimnies, round or square, less adorned than those which, like little turrets, crest the houses of the Portuguese peasantry, and yet not less happily suited to their place; the hedge of clipped box beneath the windows, the rose bushes beside the door, the little patch of flower ground with its tall holyocks in front, the garden beside, the bee-hives, and the orchard with its bank of daffodils and snow-drops, (the earliest and the profusest in these parts,) indicate in the owners some portion of ease and leisure, some regard to neatness and comfort, some sense of natural and innocent and healthful enjoyment. The new cottages of the manufacturers, are . . . upon the manufacturing pattern . . . naked, and in a row.

How is it, said I, that every thing which is connected with manufactures, presents such features of unqualified deformity? From the largest of Mammon's temples down to the poorest hovel in which his helotry are stalled, the edifices have all one character. Time cannot mellow them; Nature will neither clothe nor conceal them; and they remain always as offensive to the eye as to the mind!

We had proceeded a little way along the terrace, to that spot which commands the finest view of Derwentwater and of the vale of Keswick. How well, said Sir Thomas, has yonder dwelling been placed! pointing to one immediately below us; how happily is it sheltered from the north and east, how humbly and contentedly it appears to rest, and how deep a shade does it enjoy in summer, under those sycamores which have now lost their leaves! If we past the door I should expect to hear the humming of the spinning-wheel; and if I looked into the economy of the household, to find it little different from what I was accustomed to see in my youth.

MONTESINOS.

You would find a Bible and a Prayer-Book, instead of a Crucifix and a Rosary; cloth coats instead of leathern jerkins upon the men and boys, and cotton in the place of woollen for the women, when they are in their better dress. The Reformation seems almost to have abolished the use of fish among this class of the community; they have contracted, I know not how, some obstinate prejudice against a kind of food at once wholesome and delicate, and every where to be obtained cheaply and in abundance, were the demand for it as general as it ought to be. Most of the pot-herbs and salads which Tusser enumerates, have disappeared from the cottager's garden, and even their names are no longer in remembrance. The potatoe has supplanted them. Greater change has been introduced by the now universal use of tea in these kingdoms, a beverage from which more, and more various good has been derived without any admixture of adventitious evil, than from any other which has ever been devised by human ingenuity. Except as to this difference in their appearance and in their diet, you would find the peasantry little changed in their habits of life and less improved. The Reformation has done them no good; and nothing has grown up in the decay of the feudal system, to repay them for the kindly attachments which existed under it. They are neither happier nor wiser in their sphere; but they have the easy opportunity of getting out of it, and the possibility of emerging above it. The adventurous youth may seek his fortune in the United States, or in our own colonies. The industrious may work his way up in trade. And of those who pass their pitiable childhood as part of the machinery in a cotton mill, (for the cotton is now the staple trade of Great Britain,) perhaps one in a thousand, by good conduct and good fortune, obtains an employment in the business, which places him in a respectable station; and one in a myriad becomes a master manufacturer himself, and founds a family who take their place among the monied aristocracy of the land. There is a continual creation of wealth; and in the lottery which this produces, some of the prizes fall to their lot.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And it is because of the creation of that wealth, that your government considers the prosperity of its manufactures as of so much importance to the state?

MONTESINOS.

For this, and for the still more important object of giving employment to a large part of our great and rapidly increasing population.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But this sort of employment tends to accelerate that increase, by forcing it even so as to leave a large surplus, after supplying the lavish consumption of health and life which the manufacturing system requires. For among persons so trained up, moral restraint is not to be looked for, and there is little prudential restraint; the fear of the lean wolf is not before their eyes. In proportion, therefore, as the object is effected in one generation, it becomes more difficult in every succeeding one, and yet more necessary. But leaving for the present that consideration, let us examine the consequences of a continual creation of wealth, which, as it is a new thing in the world, must necessarily produce new results. What if it should prove that the wealth which is thus produced is no more an indication of public prosperity, than the size of one whose limbs are swollen with dropsy is a symptom of health and vigour?

MONTESINOS.

You are leading me toward the region of metaphysical politics, and as I am not owl-eyed, I can follow no farther than the daylight penetrates into that land of fogs and darkness.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Daylight will serve us here. All wealth in former times was tangible. It existed either in land, money, or chattels, which were either of real or conventional value.

MONTESINOS.

Jewels, for example; . . and pictures, as in Holland, . . where indeed, at one time, tulip-bulbs answered the same purpose.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

That bubble was one of those contagious insanities to which communities are subject. All wealth was real, till the extent of commerce rendered a paper currency necessary, which differed from precious stones and pictures in this important point, that there was no limit to its production.

MONTESINOS.

We regard it as the representative of real wealth, and therefore limited always to the amount of what it represents.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Pursue that notion, . . and you will be in the dark presently. Your provincial bank notes, which constitute almost wholly the circulating medium of certain districts, pass current to-day; to-morrow, tidings may come that the house which issued them has stopt payment, and what do they represent then? You find them the shadow of a shade.

MONTESINOS.

This is an evil frequent enough, and extensive enough in its effects to be called a national grievance, and one which I have long thought it the duty of government to prevent. Scarcely a year passes without some failure of this kind, and every failure brings with it wide-spreading distress, and to many an industrious family, ruin, as unavoidable as it is irretrievable and undeserved. For in many parts of the kingdom (here for example it is the case), they who might distrust the security of such paper, have no choice; there is no other currency for daily use. I am too little versed in such subjects (having indeed neither liking nor aptitude for them) to understand why the provincial banks should not be superseded by establishments connected with the Bank of England; but this I know, that one of the duties of a government is to provide the subjects with a safe currency. However, this is wandering from your argument. Proceed, I pray you.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In what light do you regard the national debt?

MONTESINOS.

Again I must confess my incompetence for discussions of this kind: they belong to what is called political economy, . . . a science concerning which there is a great deal written and talked, and very little understood.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But you consider it a species of property?

MONTESINOS.

Undoubtedly.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Real or representative?

MONTESINOS.

Did I not say that you were leading me into the region of darkness?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You can understand that it constitutes a great part of the national wealth?

MONTESINOS.

So large a part, that the interest amounted, during the prosperous times of agriculture, to as much as the rental of all the land in Great Britain ; and at present, to the rental of all lands, all houses, and all other fixed property put together.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The interest is of course real and tangible. What is the principal ?

MONTESINOS.

Real also, because any part of it is tangible and producible at any time.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But it is only in part that it can thus be realized.

MONTESINOS.

As large a part as can ever be required.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

We shall come to that question. The whole is plainly not producible ; it is neither real nor representative, but a mere fiction of policy and convenience.

MONTESINOS.

Why will you bewilder me ?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Yet as the gods were derived from Erebus and Night, this fiction has given birth to wealth and power and happiness. Whence comes the interest ; that part which is real, tangible, and regularly produced ?

MONTESINOS.

It is raised by taxation, and that taxation it is which constitutes the great burthen of these kingdoms.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is raised then from the whole body of the nation, and distributed to that portion of them whose property is vested in this fiction. Is the country most impoverished by the extraction, or benefited by the distribution ?

MONTESINOS.

You might as reasonably ask whether the fields are injured by evaporation, more than they are refreshed by rain and dew !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is not then a mere debt, . . a mere burthen ?

MONTESINOS.

On the contrary, it is so much property vested in the manner most convenient to the owners. The effects of the funded system could as little have been foreseen when it was devised as the extent to which it has been carried. It has not only supplied the necessities of the state from time to time, and enabled it to support the costs, ruinous as they then appeared, of the American war, and the still more enormous expenditure of the last contest, but by its operation the wars themselves became a cause of national prosperity, . . the funds, as they were increased, affording an advantageous and secure deposit for the new wealth created by that increased activity which the war expenditure called forth. And the wealth thus deposited being producible at a moment, to any amount, has supplied capital for speculations upon a scale unknown in other countries, or in other times. British machinery may be exported, or equalled ; British ingenuity may be rivalled ; but it is British capital that puts all in motion ; and it will be long before any other nation can possess capital enough to render its rivalry effectual.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Another and far more momentous benefit must not be overlooked, . . the expenditure of an annual interest equalling, as you have stated, the present rental of all fixed property.

MONTESINOS.

That expenditure gives employment to half the industry in the kingdom, and feeds half the mouths. Take, indeed, the weight of the national debt from this great and complicated social machine, and the wheels must stop.

The old apologue of the belly and members is as applicable to those reformers who are for ridding us of this debt, as it was to the Roman agitators in the days of Menenius Agrippa.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Such being, according to this view of the subject, (and it is undeniable,) the effect of the national debt, is it the object of your government to extend, or to diminish it?

MONTESINOS.

To diminish it, of course.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Why of course, if it be advantageous to the nation?

MONTESINOS.

For the purpose of diminishing the national burthens.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Explain to me how that, which is a national advantage, can be at the same time a national burthen? how the same thing can at once be an evil and a good?

MONTESINOS.

I told you honestly, when you entered upon this discussion, that it led to subjects which I did not understand.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You will understand them better, if you examine the state of your own knowledge. We shall come to something presently which is perfectly intelligible....In what manner will your government proceed to diminish this national burthen, (considering it now as a burthen,) when it shall have the means of so doing?

MONTESINOS.

By extinguishing that portion of it which bears the highest rate of interest, giving the holders, when the state of the funds shall admit of such a transaction, their option of being paid off, or having their stock converted into stock of a lower rate. If this were done, for example, with stock which produces at present an annual interest of five millions, an annual million of taxes might be remitted.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And would this, think you, be a desirable measure?

MONTESINOS.

The minister will think himself fortunate who shall be able to effect it. But of all subjects, who would have expected that one from the dead should choose to enter upon political economy, and the state of the stocks!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You know I have visited the Limbo, and you do not suppose that books of poetry are the only tomes which are whirled away thither.... The minister, you say, will think himself fortunate, who shall be able to remit a million yearly in taxation, by annihilating twenty millions of the five per cents, or, which is the same thing, withholding a fifth part of the interest paid upon an hundred millions of that stock?

MONTESINOS.

He will not only think himself so, but will be thought so by the nation, and applauded accordingly.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But how will that part of the community feel from whose incomes this million is to be deducted? Will they think themselves fortunate? The measure which they will hear of as a public benefit, they will feel as an individual grievance; and it will be difficult to make them acknowledge, that a heavy and exclusive taxation imposed upon them, can be both a consequence and a cause of general prosperity.

MONTESINOS.

There it will fall heavily, and precisely upon persons on whom the burthens of the state have always borne with the severest pressure. The respectable provision which men of moderate fortune can make for their widows and unmarried daughters has more generally been vested in the four and five per cents than in any other way. During the war, the active members of society could increase their exertions in proportion as new burthens were laid on, and all who had anything to sell raised their prices in such proportion as to be gainers by the impost; from the greatest landholder to the meanest shop-keeper this was done. The whole weight fell upon those whose incomes were fixed; and these persons,. .the very class whom for every consideration of feeling and humanity it would be desirable to favour, (if that were possible),. . as they suffered most during the war, so will they be the sole sufferers from a measure consequent on the prosperity that peace brings with it, when the settled effects of peace shall be felt.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

How far will this system of reduction be pursued?

MONTESINOS.

I suppose as far as it can. The four per cents will follow the fives, and then, if the creation of wealth continues, perhaps a reduction of the threes will be attempted also.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

By what means can the government be enabled to effect this?

MONTESINOS.

Only by the great rise of stock consequent upon the rapid creation of wealth, so little interest being produced by money vested in the funds when they are at a high price, and the general interest of money falling in proportion, that the fundholders will rather suffer the reduction of a fifth, or even a fourth, upon their dividends, than be paid off when they would not know how to apply the capital.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In proportion then as wealth is created in one quarter, it is, as far as this operation extends, annihilated in another. This is like your Hindoo mythology ; but in part only, . . . for while we have the Creator and the Destroyer here at work, I miss the Preserving Power ! It should seem a strange system of society, that in which a government takes and obtains credit for a measure which diminishes the means and curtails the expenditure of many of its subjects. Will the general good be greater than the partial evil ?

MONTESINOS.

The public and private expenditure of this country are both upon so large a scale, that the diminution of one or two millions in the annual imposts, or in the annual circulation and consumption would be scarcely perceptible. As far as individuals are concerned, the benefit will be sensibly felt by none; but there are some who will feel the injury. No moderate income can bear the diminution of a fifth without inconvenience. Some privations will be rendered necessary: in some cases this will be felt sorely, and retrenchment is always injurious to a nation whose prosperity depends upon expenditure. But these cases, it may be believed, will not be numerous; and the reduction, which in most of the necessities of life has been made from the war-prices, must be taken into the account. Indeed there will be no complaint, because there is no injustice; the property was acquired and held with the knowledge that it was liable to this contingency; and in every case the price originally paid for it will have been less than what the holders will draw out, if they choose to receive the principal. The evil, therefore, will be limited in its extent, and transient in its nature, whereas the relief from taxation will be permanent.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But you have represented that relief as imperceptible.

MONTESINOS.

Imperceptible as relief, but it will be felt in public opinion, and the government will feel it. The farther, indeed, that such reductions can be carried, the better able will the state be to support the demands of any future war; an evil which we should endeavour always equally to avert, and to be prepared for.

I had overlooked something which is likely to lessen the inconvenience of paying off a part of the public creditors. Many of them may be willing to receive their principal and vest it in foreign funds, which pay an interest so much higher as to render the risk a tempting one. If the amount of British property, which has already been thus embarked, were known, it would appear surprising.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In this manner some of your redundant wealth, as well as of your redundant zeal, flows abroad, to your own relief, and to the benefit of all parts of the world. This is certainly an unequivocal good.

MONTESINOS.

So I should regard it, even if it enabled other countries to pursue with more advantage their system of commercial rivalry. The benefits of commerce cannot be too widely diffused, their general extension being for the general good: and if our neighbours are desirous of taking their share of its evil, by extending their own manufactures to the eventual exclusion of ours, their success would be the best thing that could happen for Great Britain.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

We have looked at one consequence of the rapid creation of wealth, which is going on under your present system. So long as that creation proceeds without impediment, so long it will be in the intention and in the power of government to reduce the national debt. Of course, therefore, no property will be vested in the funds, if it can be disposed of in any other way : nor is it credible that the foreign funds should either obtain so much credit in this country, or be extended to a scale sufficient for acting in their stead. What direction then will this redundant capital take ?

MONTESINOS.

It will be ready for any imaginable scheme which holds out the prospect of what used to be common interest ; . . bridges, tunnels, canals, rail-roads, joint-stock companies for every conceivable purpose. In such undertakings, immense sums will be invested and lost.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

So that the destruction will keep pace with the creation ?

MONTESINOS.

Not exactly so. Some will lose and some will gain; and the expenditure in which the one sink their capital, will increase the capital of the other by the productive labour which it calls forth.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Columbus was of opinion, that the gold in his conquests might enable the Kings of Spain to make the whole of their dominions like a well-cultivated garden. But then he assumed that this gold would be at the direct disposal of the state.

MONTESINOS.

Ancient Egypt exhibited the finest example of what might be done by a government making the improvement of the country its main object. Every thing was done there which art could do for the advantage and embellishment of the land. Buonaparte did a little in this kind, and boasted largely of it. Our government makes no parade of such things. It leaves travellers to proclaim and even to discover that every creek upon the coast of Scotland, where a fisher's boat could need shelter, is protected with a pier; that in the wildest and remotest parts of that country, civilization is forwarded by some of the finest roads in the world, and that large ships may pass across the island from sea to sea, by a canal, which is the greatest work of its kind that has ever been attempted either in ancient or in modern times.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Can a nation be too rich ?

MONTESINOS.

I am sure individuals can; and have often said that, rather than have been born and bred to a great fortune, I should deem it better for myself always to live precariously, and die poor at last.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But for a nation ?

MONTESINOS.

I cannot answer that question without distinguishing between a people and a state. A state cannot have more wealth at its command than may be employed for the general good, a liberal expenditure in national works being one of the surest means for promoting national prosperity, and the benefit being still more evident of an expenditure directed to the purposes of national improvement. But a people may be too rich ; because it is the tendency of the commercial, and more especially of the manufacturing system, to collect wealth rather than to diffuse it. Where wealth is successfully employed in any of the speculations of trade, its increase is in proportion to its amount; great capitalists become like pikes in a fish-pond, who devour the weaker fish; and it is but too certain that the poverty of one part of the people seems to increase in the same ratio as the riches of another. There are examples of this in history. In Portugal, when the high tide of wealth flowed in from the conquests in Africa and the East, the effect of that great influx was not more visible in the augmented splendour of the Court, and the luxury of the higher ranks, than in the distress of the people.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The prodigality of Henry's courtiers, for which the funds were supplied by sacrilege, was producing the same effect when I was removed from the sight of evils which I had vainly endeavoured to withstand.

MONTESINOS.

In these cases the consequences were so immediate and direct that there could be no doubt concerning the cause. But different causes are in operation at this time, and they are likely to be more permanent and more pernicious. Commerce and manufactures, nearly as they are connected, differ widely in their effects upon society. The former, it cannot be denied, has produced enormous evils when it has been associated with schemes of conquest and usurpation; but this is no natural association; its natural operations are wholly beneficial, binding nations to nations, and man to man. How opposite the manufacturing system is in its tendency, must be manifest to all who see things as they are, and not through the delusive medium of their own theories and prepossessions.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The desire of gain is common to them both.

MONTESINOS.

A distinction must be made between this and the love of lucre. The pursuit of independence, . . of that degree of wealth without which the comforts and respectabilities of life are not to be procured, . . . the ambition even of obtaining enough to command those luxuries which may innocently and commendably be enjoyed, must be allowed to be beneficial both to the individuals who are thus stimulated to exertion, and to the community which is affected by their exertions. This is inseparable from commerce; in fact it is the main spring of that social order which is established among us. In this, indeed, as in all other desires, self-watchfulness is necessary, and the restraint of a higher principle: and in the mercantile profession there is much to qualify it and keep it within due bounds. We are not accustomed to class that profession among the liberal ones; and yet it ought to be classed among the most liberal, as being that which, when properly and wisely exercised, requires the most general knowledge, and affords the fairest opportunities for acquiring and enlarging it. There is nothing in its practice which tends to contract the mind, to sophisticate the understanding, or to corrupt the feelings.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is from those merchants who were 'as Princes,' that Princes themselves have derived assistance, states strength, and statesmen information, the arts their best patronage, and literature not unfrequently its best encouragement. Did you know more of the merchants of Tyre, it would appear that in that age no other power or influence upon the face of the earth was so beneficially exercised as theirs. Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries, had such merchants in my days. The Moors had them, before the Portugueze, by the conquest of Ceuta, by the destruction of their little commercial states along the coast of Eastern Africa, where every petty chieftain (like Alcinous) was a merchant, by their seizure of Malacca and Ormuz, and the system of destructive warfare which they carried on in the Indian and Red Seas, cut the roots of Mahommedan power, and unhappily of Mahommedan civilization. You have such merchants now.

MONTESINOS.

Many such. The evil in that profession is, that men are tempted by the hope of great prizes to undue risks; the spirit of enterprise is allowed to pass the bounds of prudence and of principle, and then the merchant becomes in fact a gamester. Examples of this become more frequent, as the habits of life become more emulously expensive. But the ordinary and natural consequences of commerce are every way beneficial; they are humanizing, civilizing, liberalizing; if it be for the purpose of gain that it compasses sea and land, it carries with it industry, activity, and improvement: these are its effects abroad, while it brings wealth to us at home. Whereas the immediate and home effect of the manufacturing system, carried on as it now is upon the great scale, is to produce physical and moral evil, in proportion to the wealth which it creates. Here is our danger, our sore and spreading evil . . . here, I had almost said, is * Lord Surrey.

‘ the harm

At such a price national prosperity would be dearly purchased, even if any prosperity which is so purchased were, or could be stable. Alas ! wherefore is it that communities and individuals so seldom keep the even line, though it appears to be plain and straight before them !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Because they walk sometimes in mist and darkness, and sometimes giddily and precipitately when the way is clear. But the way is not always plain, nor, when plain, is it always easy. Both men and nations are liable to evils which are the consequence, not of their own errors, but of their position, . . . of circumstances in which they find themselves, and over which they have had no control.

MONTESINOS.

‘ For he that once hath missed the right way,
The further he doth go, the further he doth stray.’*

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Society has its critical periods, and its climacterics ; no change, no developement can take place at such seasons without inducing some peculiar and accompanying danger ; and at all seasons it is liable to its influenzas and its plagues. This is one of its grand climacterics.

A new principle, . . . a novum organum has been introduced, . . . the most powerful that has ever yet been wielded by man. If it was first Mitrum that governed the world, and then Nitrum, both have had their day, . . . gunpowder as well as the triple crown. Steam will govern the world next, . . . and shake it too before its empire is established.

STEAM—WAR—PROSPECTS OF EUROPE.

‘ THE ancients,’ says* Dr. Arbuthnot, ‘ had more occasion for mechanics in the art of war, than we have ; gunpowder readily producing a force far exceeding all the engines they had contrived for battery. And this, I reckon, has lost us a good occasion for improving our mechanics ; the cunning of mankind never exerting itself so much as in their arts of destroying one another.’ Since Arbuthnot’s age the desire of gain has produced greater improvements in mechanics than were ever called forth by the desire of conquest. And yet the great inventions of the world have arisen from a worthier origin than either ; they have generally been the work of quiet, unambitious, unworldly men, pursuing some favourite branch of science, patiently, for its own sake.

Steam, said I to Sir Thomas when he visited me next, has fearfully accelerated a process which was going on already but too fast. Could I contemplate the subject without reference to that Providence which brings about all things in its own good time, I should be tempted to think that the discovery of this mighty power had come to us, like the possession of great and dangerous wealth to a giddy youth, before we knew how to employ it rightly.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is, however, a power which had long been known before it was brought into use for general purposes. In Justinian's reign, the philosopher, Anthemius, employed it in his extraordinary devices for annoying a next-door neighbour, and Pope Silvester made an organ which was worked by it.

MONTESINOS.

Even at a much later period, extraordinary experiments excited little attention at the time they were made, though they are now looked back upon with wonder, as having anticipated some of the most remarkable discoveries of the present age. A Portugeuze ascended in some kind of balloon at Lisbon, more than an hundred years ago. In cases of public display like this, or of public notoriety such as those earlier and more remarkable ones which you have instanced, we may, with some reason, wonder that no consequences followed, . . . that the same age in which the knowledge implied in such experiments was to be found, should not have produced minds capable of pursuing them to some great and useful result. So, too, with regard to the invention of printing: the ancients missed it, though the sepulchral lamps show us that Greek potters imprinted their names upon their ware; and though, among their gallants, it was the custom for an amonist to impress the name of his mistress in the dust, or upon the damp earth, with letters fixed upon his shoe. It is not surprising that the prism should, for generations have been given to children as a plaything, and sent out, among other baubles, as a toy for savages, before Newton used it as an instrument of science, because it required an intellect like Newton's to analyse the phenomenon which it presented; but in these cases the application was direct and easy, and to purposes of common and obvious utility.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Some discoveries have been the effect of mere chance, . . . that of glass for example, which has given astronomers the telescope, entomology its animalcular world, old age its second sight, and which contributes to the comfort of every class in society, not less than to the luxuries and elegancies of those who are most favoured by fortune. Others have been the result of fortuitous experiments in the use of herbs and mineral substances; and these found their way slowly into general use, because some selfish interest not unfrequently withheld them for its own purposes. Your manufacturers and artificers have their secrets at this day, as the priests of Greece and Egypt had theirs, . .

MONTESINOS.

And the monks and friars of the middle ages.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Remember that one mighty discovery was withheld by a friar, in mercy to mankind.

MONTESINOS.

No finer proof of foresight and true greatness of mind has ever been given than in that illustrious instance; for Roger Bacon's motives cannot be mistaken. He desired the praise of knowledge, and yet was contented to forego the honour of this discovery, till a secret, of which he anticipated the destructive application, should be brought to light by some future experimentalist, less humane, or less considerate than himself. But no merit must be claimed for the friars on his score. It is for his country, not his order, to glory in the man whom that order condemned to imprisonment, not for his supposed skill in magic, but for those opinions* which he derived from studying the Scriptures, wherein he was versed beyond any other person of his age.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In what a different state of feeling did Johannes de Rupescissa speculate upon chemical discoveries, when he † advised that the art of composing his cordial corroborative, of which brandy was the chief constituent, should be kept carefully as a state secret, lest it should come to the knowledge of the enemies of the church; and that, as a sure means of rendering Christian armies victorious, a dose should be given to every man before the battle began !

Sûâ antiquitate sacræ litteræ commendantur; sat sûâ vetustate consistunt.*—Wadding, A.D. 1278, § 26.

It is evident from this passage, that the annalist of the Friars Minorite regarded Roger Bacon more as a heretic than as the greatest and wisest man of his order and his age.

MONTESINOS.

How different also was the temper of this the elder Bacon, from the blind temerity with which certain modern experiments upon the nature and effect of certain poisons have been promulgated. It was right that such experiments should be made and carefully recorded, for the advancement of science, because we are justified in presuming that this must ultimately be for the benefit of mankind ; but they should have been published in a language which would have confined the knowledge to that class of persons for whom it was designed. To render it accessible* to every one, was putting into the hands of the wicked more formidable means of mischief than had before ever been known.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

So that the craft which conceals knowledge for its own sinister purposes may sometimes be less injurious to society, than is the rashness which promulgates it without consideration of consequences.

MONTESINOS.

The rashness may produce greater immediate mischief, but surely not so much lasting evil. For the evil which arises from any increase and misdirection of human power can be only for a time.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Only for a time ! Think for a moment, Montesinos, you who exist in time, what time is to those who are in a state of suffering ! Plague, pestilence and famine are but for a time. You put up your prayers, and not without perpetual cause, that you may be spared from such visitations. And there is no less cause for praying that you may be delivered from the social plague, the moral pestilence which you have been preparing for yourselves. You have ploughed and manured the ground, and sown the seed and watered it : if you reap as you have sown, God have mercy upon those who see the harvest !

MONTESINOS.

You would make me apprehend then, that we have advanced in our chemical and mechanical discoveries faster than is consistent with the real welfare of society.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You cannot advance in them too fast, provided that the moral culture of the species keep pace with the increase of its material powers. Has it been so ? The question may be resolved if we look at the two great inventions of which we have been led to speak. Was Roger Bacon right in his forebodings, that the discovery of gunpowder was a perilous secret, which, whenever it was divulged, would prove destructive to his fellow creatures ?

MONTESINOS.

That foreboding evinced, in a remarkable degree, his foresight ; for though he perceived at once the main use to which the discovery would be applied, men were slow in applying it to that purpose. More than two centuries elapsed after the first appearance of fire-arms in European warfare, before any material effect in war was produced by them, and nearly a third before the whole system of war was changed in consequence ; so greatly did his intellect outstrip the march of ordinary minds. That the discovery should have been less immediately destructive than he had feared, proves only the extent and quickness of his foresight. And if he anticipated that it would be more hurtful to humanity than it has proved, it was not possible for human sagacity to perceive in what manner the complicated relations of society would be affected by so great but gradual a change in what, during that age, to the reproach of human nature, constituted the great business of mankind.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The art of war, like every other art, ecclesiastical architecture alone excepted, was greatly deteriorated during those years of general degradation, which preceded and produced the overthrow of the Roman Empire. It would have revived about the time when gunpowder was introduced, without the introduction of any such new agent, as a necessary consequence of the systems of dominion which then began to be developed. Kingdoms just then acquired extent and stability, and sovereigns perceived that policy was the better part of strength. The feudal system had been broken down: chivalry and the chivalrous system of war could not long survive it. War must have been modified by the changes of society, whether gunpowder had been introduced or not; and if there had not been this invention, the restoration of letters would probably have brought back the tactics of the ancients. Some evil has resulted from the substitution, but on the whole it has been advantageous to humanity.

MONTESINOS.

It has made sieges more terrible.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

More terrible while they last ; and it has the evil of having given a decided advantage to the besiegers, whereas, in the warfare of the ancients and of the middle ages, the means of defence appear to have been more efficacious than those of attack. But to compensate for this the duration of sieges is shortened ; and except in rare instances, which, when they occur, draw after them the execration of mankind, the conquest is less ferocious, and less disgraceful to human nature.

MONTESINOS.

This is owing to the greater humanity of modern times ; to an improved state of public feeling, derived from the more extended influence of religion, which acts in no slight degree even upon the irreligious themselves, ungrateful as they are for the benefit, or unconscious of it.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

There is another reason. The manner of war, which affords most opportunity for personal prowess, and requires most individual exertion, calls forth more personal feeling and, consequently, fiercer passions. How much more murderous would battles be, if they were decided by the sword and bayonet ; how few prisoners would be taken, and how little mercy shown!

MONTESINOS.

In proof of this, more Englishmen fell at Towton than in any of Marlborough's battles, or at Waterloo.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In war, then, it is manifestly better that men, in general, should act in masses as machines, than with an individual feeling.

MONTESINOS.

I remember to have read or heard of a soldier in our late war, who was one day told by his officer to take aim when he fired, and make sure of his man. 'I cannot do it, Sir!' was his reply. 'I fire into their ranks, and that does as well; but to single out one among them, and mark him for death, would lie upon my mind afterwards.' The man who could feel thus was worthy of a better station than that in which his lot had been assigned.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And yet, Montesinos, such a man was well placed, if not for present welfare, for his lasting good. A soul that can withstand the heart-hardening tendencies of a military life, is strengthened and elevated by it. In what other station could he have attained that quiet dignity of mind, that consciousness of moral strength, which is possessed by those who, living daily in the face of death, live also always in the fear of God.

MONTESINOS.

That speech, Sir Thomas, would have delighted the old General, who, one day when he was reproving a grenadier for some neglect of duty, and telling him he could not bear to see a grenadier bring disgrace upon his corps, grew warm with the subject, and clapping him on the shoulder said, ‘Why, man, do you know ‘that a grenadier is the greatest character in this ‘world,’ . . . and, after a moment’s pause, adding the emphasis of an oath to his speech, . . . ‘and, I ‘believe, in the next, too!’* There is, indeed, in the military and naval professions, what Dr. Johnson has well called the dignity of danger, and which, as he observes, accounts for the proper estimation in which they are held. But I know not how any parents, who consider the moral danger incident to those professions, can make choice of either for a son.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The armies of the ancients were in a better

* This story is told (I forget where) of General Meadows.

state of discipline, taking that word in its comprehensive sense, than those of later times. This was owing to their constitution, for the soldiers were not taken from the lowest classes of society. There existed no such class in the ancient world as that, which, by a word of recent invention, is called the mob.* Their place was supplied by slaves. The Roman soldiers had the pride of rank and character to support; and in their westward and northward movement, wherever they went as conquerors, they went as civilizers also. They were worse colonists than those whom Greece sent forth in the happiest age of Greece; but better, far better than any that have succeeded them.

MONTESINOS.

Yet the worst subjects must, in all ages, have taken shelter in a military life from the punishment which they deserved, or the misfortunes which they had brought upon themselves.

It was their beast of burthen, and called first mobile vulgus, but fell naturally into the contraction of one syllable, and ever since is become proper English.'—Examen. part. 3, c. vii. § 89.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

That could only be where men were loose in society, in which point it is that one main difference consists between modern and ancient governments. As soon as the Roman armies, instead of being composed of Roman and Italian soldiers, were recruited from all nations, they became less efficient for the defence of the empire, and more ripe for mutinies and mischiefs of every kind.

MONTESINOS.

The nations by whom that empire was overthrown, made the military a privileged order, for motives of policy as well as of pride. But we read of mercenaries early in the middle ages. It is apparent that every chief who could afford to entertain such men would gladly have them in his pay, because, so long as he could depend upon them, they were more effectually at his service than the followers whom he could bring into the field by virtue of the feudal system. But they are always mentioned with horror as the scourge and curse of the country wherein they were employed.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

They had no character to preserve, except for courage; and perhaps the reputation of ferocity enhanced the value of their service in making them feared as well as hated by the people. For the most part they must have been men who were disposed by inclination not less than circumstances rather for evil than for good. The great body of them consisted of persons whose violent temper, or lawless habits, led them to a roving life. Your earliest laws speak of robbers, whom they class according to their number*, either in companies, or troops, or armies; and they were so numerous, that if a traveller or stranger were met with out of the road, it was lawful†, unless he were blowing a horn, or shouting aloud, to put him to death. This is proof how greatly the people were infested by such outlaws. But as soon as the state of public affairs afforded employment for mercenaries, these men were glad to exchange their appellation and better their quarters, . . . especially as they were to pursue a similar course of life under the sanction and protection of the great, and to receive pay for it.

* ‘Fures appellamus societatem septem hominum; e septem usque ad xxxv turmam, et deinde esto exercitus.’ This is in one of Ina’s laws.—Canciani, t. iv. 237.

† By a law of Wihtræd’s which was repeated by Ina.—Canciani, t. iv. 234. 337.

MONTESINOS.

These robbers, however, were men who, like Robin Hood and his companions, might have made out a strong case in exculpation of themselves. At first they were, beyond a doubt, those Britons who, amid the ruin and misery which was brought upon them by the Saxon conquest, found consolation in the exercise of vengeance, and instead of retiring with their countrymen to the mountainous parts of the island, remained in their own country, and trusted to the cover of the woods and marshes. When that race was extinct, runaway slaves supplied their place. The Norman invasion reduced many of the Saxons to this condition; and under the Norman kings the forest laws made outlaws, just as in these days the fashion of preserving game for what, upon the scale which it is carried on, deserves rather to be called butchery than sport, makes poachers. Similar causes operated upon the continent, though not to an equal extent: political revolutions, [and the intolerable oppression and injustice] which they produced, made men desperate; and then they turned upon society as much for self-preservation as for vengeance. We know of only one country which was acquired by occupancy, not by conquest: with respect to soil, climate, and every physical circumstance, it might be considered as the most unhappy part of the whole habitable world; but looking at its history, and the moral condition of its inhabitants, it is that spot upon the earth which may be regarded with most pleasure.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

See how men are the creatures of circumstances! The Norwegians, who settled upon Iceland, were neither more advanced in knowledge, nor under the influence of better principles, than their countrymen and contemporaries: and had they sought their fortune in Ireland, Scotland, or the smaller British isles, their posterity would not have been what certainly they were, always the most peaceful, and, during the darkest ages, the most intellectual of all Christian people. But let us return to the continent from whence they came. It was cleared for one generation of its most restless spirits by William the Conqueror, who gathered them together first for winning, and afterwards for securing his kingdom. In the days of his nephew, Stephen, the mercenaries were chiefly drawn from the same countries which supplied the adventurous part of William's armies.

MONTESINOS.

They were drawn partly from those who could no longer carry on the trade of piracy, which, having so long been a royal occupation, was about this time put down; and partly, perhaps, they came from the manufacturing population which was then springing up in Brabant and Flanders. I have said that these mercenaries were regarded with horror for their cruelties:..yet war was never carried on with so little bloodshed and so little ferocity as by men of the same description in Italy.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In Italy they formed the best, and generally the largest part of the forces which were brought into the field during the ages to which you refer. And having the trade of war, for a trade they made it, in their own hands, they adapted its regulations to their own convenience. I saw the termination of that system. The French and Spaniards and Germans were not accustomed to consider war as a game at chess; their struggle in Italy was carried on upon a widely different scale, and with a widely different feeling. And even if their interference, which has proved in its consequences so fatally injurious to Italy, had not taken place, the use of fire-arms must soon have put an end to that sort of conventional fighting, which rendered a battle little more dangerous than a tournament. But there was another effect arising from the introduction of gunpowder in war, which, if Roger Bacon had perceived it, might have reconciled him to the discovery. It rendered the lot of war equal; for during the chivalrous ages that dreadful occupation was carried on upon terms of tremendous disparity for the chiefs and for their followers: the one were cased in complete steel* from head to foot; the others provided only with a corselet and a head-piece, which could afford little defence against the spear of the knight, his battle axe, his mace, or the huge sword which he wielded with both hands.

MONTESINOS.

This levelling property was grievously complained of by those whom it affected. Bayard, humane and generous as he was, and every way worthy of the high place which he holds in general estimation, never gave quarter to a harquebussier. Yet proof enough may be found in his memoirs, (without looking farther,) that the sense of honour is more generally felt in modern armies than it was in the high days of chivalry, when knights and men-at-arms shrunk from services of imminent danger, to which the foot soldiers were exposed with as little remorse as the Spahis among the Turks, whom the Janizaries in old times drove before them 'to fill* 'up the ditches of towns besieged, or to serve 'them for ladders to climb over the enemies' 'walls upon.' History, indeed, and old romance, in which the sure history of feelings and opinions, as well as of manners, is to be sought, show plainly how little effect chivalry† produced in softening and humanizing the characters of those by whom it was professed. If gunpowder did away with the 'pomp and circumstance of glorious war,' it called forth qualities for which the warfare of the middle ages allowed no scope. When this new agent of destruction was brought into full action, minds that could plan, became not less necessary for ensuring success, than hands that could execute; science, and foresight, and combination, were required; and, as the greatest benefit of all, the participation of danger induced a common feeling between officers and men, which had not before existed either in the same degree or kind, and a sense of honour and duty was diffused, which has made the military character in public estimation what it is and ought to be.

* Bien mal-aisez estoient a tuer is the memorable expression of Philippe de Comines concerning certain knights who lay helplessly on the ground while the peasants hewed away at their armour with hatchets. It may remind the reader, by contrast, of the Irish soldier's exultant exclamation, when he was using the bayonet in action for the first time.—' Captain, ' it goes into them quite aisy !'

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The religious wars, amid all their horrors and atrocities, produced some beneficial effect upon the persons engaged in them. However mistaken the parties may have been on one side, or on both, there was in both a religious principle, a sense of moral duty, a strong persuasion of right, very different from what existed in the feuds and factious struggles of the preceding ages. In Holland, for example, how differently must men have felt who were fighting on one side for their images and altars, on the other for liberty of conscience and the dearest interests of man, from those who were laying the country waste, and squandering their own lives in the disputes between the Kabeljauwse and the Hoekse! And it was the same every where. As for the great majority of the persons thus engaged, perhaps they took part in a religious war as they would have done in any other, because they found their advantage in so doing ; but the better spirits were purified and exalted.

MONTESINOS.

Exalted, perhaps, always,..but not always purified ; for those wars, even in England, where they were carried on with least ferocity, and most principle, on both sides, left men worse, both in principle and in practice, than they found them. The bad passions, which the struggle generated or fostered, survived the honest feelings by which they were originally put in action ; and that which was begun for conscience sake, was continued at last for motives of the veryest cupidity and worldly ambition.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Never let man imagine that he can pursue a good end by evil means, without sinning against his own soul ! Any other issue is doubtful ; the evil effect upon himself is certain.

MONTESINOS.

In those wars, however, the first example was given which the modern world had seen of religious discipline. It was introduced into the Prince of Parma's army by the Jesuits, than whom no men have better understood how to work upon the human mind: they enforced order and temperance, as well as ceremonious piety...humanity they did not think proper to inculcate in a war against heretics. That virtue was carefully required from his men by the great Gustavus, who would not have been so consummate a commander, unless he had been so good and pious a man. No army has ever equalled his in its moral constitution; therefore, none has ever surpassed it in military worth. He was followed in the general character of his discipline, as far as circumstances permitted, by Cromwell. There was more fanaticism among Oliver's men, and less polity, for so that organization may be called which made the Swedish camp as orderly as the best regulated city: but this was not required in England, where it was not necessary to keep the field as in an enemy's country.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is not difficult to introduce such discipline, if the commander has a true sense of its importance; for in soldiers and sailors the habit of obedience is already formed by their profession, and the profession is not more likely to render them desperately flagitious under wicked leaders, than it is to call forth the natural piety of man when that characteristic instinct is strengthened by precept and encouraged by example. But for the leader of an army to entertain such views, requires a considerate heart as well as a capacious mind; nor is the work, when effected, one that will maintain itself. In the moral, even more than in the military discipline of an army*, relaxation easily undoes all, . . . as a neglected garden is presently overrun with weeds. Religious armies, therefore, are to be looked for only when they are raised among a religious people.

MONTESINOS.

And among a religious people armies would not be needed.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Nay, my friend, are we not at this time talking of religious wars, . . . wars of which religion, so called, was the professed object, and in some of them the real and sole cause? But let us return to that subject from which the mention of these wars has caused us to diverge. The full effect of artillery had hardly been felt till the great struggle of religious principles was over. Greater means, as well as larger bodies of men, were brought into the field in the age which followed; and now, when this system of warfare has been carried to its utmost extent, a new power has been discovered, by which gunpowder itself will be superseded. Your Society for the Abolition of War is instituted just in the very age when war is about to become more destructive than in all former ages.

* Non est exercitus ex eo genere machinarum, quas multiplici rotarum serie mobiles si mane temperaveris, nullo per reliquum diem moderante, ipsæ se ordinate circumagunt, æquâ horarum partitione ac pulsu: Solarium est, quod nisi sol adsit, ac perpetuo præsens umbras dirigit, nulli est usui.—Strada. dec. ii. l. x.

MONTESINOS.

Sir Thomas, I would fain believe that we have moral anticipations in this age, as our ancestors have had mechanical and chemical ones; ...that as Roger Bacon, and Ralph Babbard, and the Marquis of Worcester, had what Fuller would have called a Pisgah View of our scientific discoveries, so through the moral telescope we are looking into the horizon of futurity. I say nothing of the Society for the Abolition of War, .. (Heaven bless the mark!) it has not obtained sufficient notice even to be in disrepute. Nor can I build upon the extension of Christian principles, till I see more charity where there is most profession. But the novel powers, which, beyond all doubt, will be directed to the purposes of destruction, are so tremendous, and likely to be so efficient, that in their consequences they may reasonably be expected to do more toward the prevention of war than any or all other causes. If, on the one hand, neither walls nor ramparts can withstand a continuous shower or rather stream of bullets impelled against them by steam, on the other, such modes of defence by the same agent are to be devised, that the open city may be rendered more secure from assailants than the strongest fortresses are at this time. Minds like that of Archimedes will now have means at command equal to their capacity and to their desires; and men will not be induced by any motives to face such engines as may be brought into the field. This will first be felt in maritime war; in which there is reason to apprehend that a change as great, and not so gradual, as that which the introduction of cannon occasioned, will soon be brought about.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Do you regard the result with alarm?

MONTESINOS.

Not even with anxiety. The empire of the seas will be to be fought for; but the same qualities whereby we have won it in the old mode of warfare, will again win it for us in the new. Bring into battle what weapons you may, it is by the arm of flesh and the heart of proof that the victory must be decided. I fear nothing for England from foreign enemies! There is, however, an end to naval war, if it be made apparent that whenever two ships engage, one, if not both, must inevitably be destroyed. And this is within the reach of our present science. The chemist and mechanist will succeed where moralists and divines have failed.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Observe in this instance, how, in the order of Providence, all things have their due time appointed. You have been threatened with an invasion of gun-boats, and, . . (alarmed, shall I say, or amused? . .) with tales of rafts* that were to work their way by wheels from the ports of France; and of balloons that, by means of condensed gas, were to transport armies across the Channel through the air. But if steam navigation had been brought to its present state only * Representations of these were common in the print-shops some three or four and twenty years ago. The balloon-scheme also was gravely discussed in newspapers. Beaumont and Fletcher, in the Night Walker, allude to reports of the same kind, which were current in their days:—

‘A dainty book!—a book of the great navy,
Of fifteen hundred ships of cannon-proof,
Built upon whales, to keep their keels from sinking,
And dragons in ’em that spit fire ten miles,
And elephants that carry goodly castles.’

half a generation sooner, or even half that term, the conquest of England would have been attempted as well as designed, and the battle must have been fought on your own shores.

MONTESINOS.

Truly, indeed, may this nation say that God has been merciful to us, and turned from us those evils which we most righteously have deserved !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Think you, then, that this is felt and acknowledged as it ought to be ?

MONTESINOS.

In thankful and thoughtful hearts assuredly it is ; but how few are they !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Few, because of the constitution of human nature, men being never thankful enough to the Disposer of all things for the great benefits received at his hands ; and because, even for those better dispositions in which natural piety prevails, there are, owing to the constitution of society, more hindrances than helps in its way. Few, therefore, as these necessarily are, can you discern in the moral and intellectual state of the world, or in its political aspects, anything to encourage that hope for the possible extinction of war which you deduce from the increased means of destruction wherewith it may now be carried on?

MONTESINOS.

May I not look to the prophecies, and say, with an old divine*, that Faith accepts God's bond, and Patience waits for payment?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Individuals have not long to wait. 'Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you!' But for communities!...when will they be in a condition to claim the bond? It is certain that all the evils in society arise from want of faith in God, and of obedience to his laws; and it is not less certain; that by the prevalence of a lively and efficient belief they would all be cured. If Christians in any country, yea, if any collected body of them, were what they might, and ought, and are commanded to be, the universal reception of the Gospel would follow as a natural and a promised† result. And in a world of Christians, the extinction of physical evil might be looked for, if moral evil, . . . that is, in Christian language, sin, . . . were removed.

MONTESINOS.

I believe so.

* Dr. Manton.

† John xvii. 20, 21.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

‘This is the rest wherewith ye may cause
‘the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing*.’
But see you anything in the actual state of the world, or of your own country, that points to this? See you anything that tends to a pacific system, except the singular cause to which you have adverted?

MONTESINOS.

Little indeed as yet, .. and yet something; .. for it is something to see in the counsels of this kingdom a plain, upright, unimpeachable system of policy towards other countries, proclaimed and pursued, in the consciousness of honour, and rectitude, and strength. There is hope for the world as well as for ourselves, when a nation, which is second to no other in resources and in renown, sees clearly that it needs no aggrandizement, abstains from all aggression, and disclaims any ambition, that alone excepted of maintaining the station to which its own exertions, and the blessing of God, have raised it.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But other nations will seek to detrude it from that station. Before you can hope for lasting peace, the systems of dominion upon the Con-

* Isaiah xxviii. 12, continent must be better developed than they yet are, or seem likely to be.

MONTESINOS.

Too large a part even of those countries which are comprised in the same political system with England, and by the revolutions of which our own state must unavoidably be affected, may remind us of the pantanaes or flood-lands of Australia, that younger portion of the earth, (as it should seem,) where the waters have not yet had time to form channels for themselves, and shape their course. We are happily circumscribed by our seas. The Scandinavian kingdoms have, in like manner, an advantage of position which renders them little likely to suffer molestation, and less to offer it. Spain has a similar advantage from nature; there would be nothing which could disturb the peace of Europe to be apprehended from that quarter, if it were left to itself, or interfered with no farther than to preserve an excellent people from the miserable anarchy with which they are threatened in a struggle between the worst of governments, and a party which might deserve to be called the worst of factions, if, being absolutely bad, it were not opposed to the only party that could be relatively worse. Such an interference would be just and merciful. . .

SIR THOMAS MORE.

If it stopped there, and had no other end in view than the prevention or mitigation of the evils which rendered it so. Look now at the more complicated parts of the European system, which in my days began to adjust itself, and is far from having recovered the dislocation which it has received in yours.

MONTESINOS.

France, which ought to be satisfied with its own power and extent of territory, will not, till a better principle prevail there than has ever yet predominated in its councils. In Germany there are jealousies which only slumber; and there is a more dangerous struggle of opinions, between governments which grant too little, and enthusiasts who demand too much. The inferior states are ill-compacted, and their weakness holds out a temptation to their ambitious neighbours. Italy is in a worse condition; a condition disgraceful to itself and reproachful to all its rulers. It suffers under the double curse of foreign dominion and of its own fatal superstition; the pestilent influence of that Upas extends far and wide, ..but Italy lies under the droppings of the poison-tree.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

What hope is there that all which is amiss in those countries should quietly be rectified, . . . that discordant sentiments and jarring interests should, like the suspended elements of floating chaos, gradually adjust themselves, find peaceably their respective levels, and settle each in its proper place? Even in natural developments, like that to which you have alluded as being yet incomplete in the flooded savannahs of Australia, ages elapse, and changes slow in cause, but both sudden and violent in effect, are wrought, before the river works out its way, and shapes for itself the channel wherein

Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum.

If it be thus where the constant and unerring laws of nature act upon passive and obedient matter, what is to be expected from the operation of human passions, under no other control than that of moral laws, in which many are ignorant, and many more are mistaught, . . . which are disregarded by some, despised by others, . . . and which all, who are daring enough to incur the responsibility of disobedience, are, fatally for themselves, free to disobey? To what, then, can you look for the preservation of peace, or for a mitigation of war? Not to the increased means of destruction, which the improvements in chemistry and in mechanics have put into your hands; for till the balance of states and of opinions be adjusted, these can only arm the strong with more effectual power against the weak. Not to the Holy Alliance, which, good as its intent may be, depends less upon any definite principles, or distinct perception of the general good, than upon the disposition of the individual sovereigns among whom it has been formed, and consequently is as precarious as their lives, or as the influence of the advisers by whom they may be governed. Will you look for it then in an approximation of feeling among those whom opinions have divided?

MONTESINOS.

Alas! every day widens those divisions, brings into collision irreconcilable interests, and exasperates the old and angry feelings which for awhile time seemed to have allayed. What security can there be when 'he that hath right fears, he that hath wrong hopes?'

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Is the prospect more comfortable if you look to the increased influence which public opinion is acquiring every day?

Hodie omnia vulgi judicio stantque, caduntque.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Proceed as you are proceeding in this country, and the affairs of government will ere long be regulated by that opinion, . . as the weathercock is by the wind. ‘ If a man walk with the wind and lie falsely, he shall even be the prophet of this people*!’

MONTESINOS.

This at least is no new evil.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But the supremacy of popular opinion is ; . . and it is the worst evil with which, in the present state of the world, civilized society is threatened.

MONTESINOS.

You teach me to look forward fearfully, as if a whirlwind were approaching, in the vortex of which we were soon to be involved !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

I would warn you in time, that so the whirlwind may not overtake you when you are gaily pressing forward with all sails set ! I would teach you, that in the progress of society every stage has its own evils and besetting dangers, the only remedy for which is, that which is least regarded by all states, except by those in which it is least understood. See in how many things the parallel between this age and mine holds good ; and how, in every instance, dangers the same in kind, but greater in degree, are awaiting yours! The art of war, which underwent its great alteration when the shield and lance were superseded by the firelock, and armour was rendered useless by artillery, is about to undergo a change not less momentous, with the same sure consequence of giving to ambition more formidable means. The invention of printing, which is to the moral world more than gunpowder or steam to the material, as it began in my days, so in yours its full effects are first beginning to unfold, when the press, which, down to the last generation, wrought only for a small part of the community, is employed with restless activity for all classes, disseminating good and evil with a rapidity and effect inconceivable in former ages, as it would have been impossible. Look, too, at manufactures; great efforts were made to encourage them then, .. the Protector Seymour (one of those politic reformers who fished in troubled waters, and fell at last into the stream) introduced a colony of clothiers from what was then the very land of sedition, and converted the most venerable edifice in this whole island to their use. You have now, what it was then thought so desirable to obtain, .. a manufacturing population, .. and it is not found so easy to regulate as it has been to raise it. The peasantry were in my time first sensible of distress brought upon them by political causes; their condition was worsened by the changes which were taking place in society; a similar effect is now more widely and more pressingly felt. In those days, the dikes and boundaries of social order began to give way, and the poor, who till then had been safely left to the care of local and private charity, were first felt as a national evil;..that evil has increased till it has now become a national danger. A new world was then discovered, .. for the punishment of its native inhabitants, the measure of whose iniquities was full; the colonies which have been established there are now in a condition seriously to affect the relations of the parent states, and America is reacting upon Europe. That was an age of religious, this of political revolutions;.. that age saw the establishment of the Jesuits, this has seen their revival.

* Micah ii. 11.

MONTESINOS.

Well indeed will it be if the religious struggle be not renewed, not with a more exasperated spirit, for that is impossible, but with a sense of deadlier danger on both sides. If the flames, which ravaged Europe in those days, are not kindled again in ours, it will not be for want of foxes and fire-brands.

COLLOQUY IX.

DERWENTWATER—CATHOLIC EMANCIPATION—IRELAND.

---

A TALL, raw-boned, hard-featured North-Briton said one day to one of our Keswick guides, at a moment when I happened to be passing by, ‘ Well, I have been to look at your lake; it’s ‘ a poor piece of water with some shabby moun- ‘ tains round about it.’ He had seen it in a cold, dark, cheerless autumnal afternoon, to as great a disadvantage as I suppose, from the stamp of his visage and the tone and temper of his voice, he would have wished to see it, for it was plain that he carried no sunshine in himself wherewith to light it up. I have visited the Scotch lakes in a kindlier disposition; and the remembrance of them will ever be cherished among my most delightful reminiscences of natural scenery. I have seen also the finest of the Alpine lakes; and felt on my return from both countries, that if Derwentwater has neither the severe grandeur of the Highland waters, nor the luxuriance, and sublimity, and glory of the Swiss and Italian, it has enough to fill the imagination and to satisfy the heart.

The best general view of Derwentwater is from the terrace, between Applethwaite and Milbeck, a little beyond the former hamlet. The old roofs and chimnies of that hamlet come finely in the foreground, and the trees upon the Ormathwaite estate give there a richness to the middle ground, which is wanting in other parts of the vale. From that spot, I once saw three artists sketching it at the same time; William Westall (who has engraved it among his admirable views of Keswick), Glover, and Edward Nash, my dear, kind-hearted friend and fellow-traveller, whose death has darkened some of the blithest recollections of my latter life. I know not from which of the surrounding heights it is seen to most advantage; any one will amply repay the labour of the ascent; and often as I have ascended them all, it has never been without a fresh delight. The best near view is from the field adjoining Friar's Crag. There it is, that, if I had Aladdin's lamp, or Fortunatus's purse, .. (with leave of Greenwich Hospital be it spoken,) I would build myself a house.

Thither I had strolled on one of those first genial days of spring which seem to affect the animal not less than the vegetable creation. At such times, even I, sedentary as I am, feel a craving for the open air and sunshine, and creep out as instinctively as snails after a shower. Such seasons, which have an exhilarating effect upon youth, produce a soothing one when we are advanced in life. The root of an ash tree, on the bank which bends round the little bay, had been half bared by the waters during one of the winter floods, and afforded a commodious resting-place whereon I took my seat, at once basking in the sun, and bathing as it were in the vernal breeze. But delightful as all about me was to eye, and ear, and feeling, it brought with it a natural reflection, . . . that the scene which I now beheld was the same which it had been and would continue to be, while so many of those, with whom I had formerly enjoyed it, were past away. Our day dreams become retrospective as we advance in years, and the heart feeds as naturally upon remembrance in age, as upon hope in youth.

Where are they gone, the old familiar faces ?*

I thought of her whom I had so often seen plying her little skiff upon that glassy water, . . . the * Charles Lamb.

Lady of the Lake. It was like a poet's dream, or a vision of romance, to behold her, . . and like a vision or a dream she had departed !

O gentle Emma, o'er a lovelier form
Than thine, earth never closed ; nor e'er did Heaven
Receive a purer spirit from the world !

I thought of D., the most familiar of my friends during those years when we lived near enough to each other for familiar intercourse ; . . my friend, and the friend of all who were dearest to me ; . . a man of whom all who knew him will concur with me in saying, that they never knew nor could conceive of one more strictly dutiful, more actively benevolent, more truly kind, more thoroughly good ; . . the pleasantest companion, the sincerest counsellor, the most considerate friend, the kindest host, the welcomest guest. After our separation, he had visited me here three summers : with him it was that I had first explored this Land of Lakes in all directions ; and again and again should we have retraced our steps in the wildest recesses of these vales and mountains, and lived over the past again, if he had not, too early for all who loved him . . .

Began the travel of eternity.

I called to mind my hopeful H——, too, so often the sweet companion of my morning walks to this very spot; . . in whom I had fondly thought my better part should have survived me, and

‘ With whom, it seemed, my very life

‘ Went half away!

‘ But we shall meet, . . but we shall meet

‘ Where parting tears shall never flow;

‘ And when I think thereon, almost

‘ I long to go!’ *

‘ Thy dead shall live,’ O Lord! ‘ together
‘ with my dead body shall they arise. Awake
‘ and sing, ye that dwell in dust! for Thy dew
‘ is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast
‘ out the dead!’ †

Surely to the sincere believer death would be an object of desire instead of dread, were it not for those ties, . . those heart-strings . . by which we are attached to life. Nor indeed do I believe that it is natural to fear death, however generally it may be thought so. From my own feelings I have little right to judge; for, although * These lines are quoted from a little volume, entitled Solitary Hours, which, with the ‘Widow’s Tale,’ &c. of the same authoress, I recommend to all admirers of that poetry that proceeds from the heart.

† Isaiah xxvi. 19.

habitually mindful that the hour cometh, and even now may be, it has never appeared actually near enough to make me duly apprehend its effect upon myself. But from what I have observed, and what I have heard those persons say whose professions lead them to the dying, I am induced to infer that the fear of death is not common, and that where it exists, it proceeds rather from a diseased or enfeebled mind, than from any principle in our nature. Certain it is that, among the poor, the approach of dissolution is usually regarded with a quiet and natural composure which it is consolatory to contemplate, and which is as far removed from the dead palsy of unbelief, as it is from the delirious raptures of fanaticism. Theirs is a true, unhesitating faith; and they are willing to lay down the burthen of a weary life in the sure and certain hope of a blessed immortality. Who indeed is there that would not gladly make the exchange, if he lived only for himself, and were to leave none who stood in need of him, no eyes to weep at his departure, no hearts to ache for his loss? The day of death, says the Preacher, is better than the day of one's birth, . . a sentence to which whoever has lived long, and may humbly hope that he has not lived ill, must heartily assent. The excellent Henry Scougal used to say that, 'abstracted from the will of God, mere curiosity would make him long for another world.' How many of the ancients committed suicide from the mere weariness of life, a conviction of the vanity of human enjoyments, or to avoid the infirmities of old age! This, too, in utter uncertainty concerning a future state; not with the hope of change, for in their prospect there was no hope; but for the desire of death.

Into this train of musing I had fallen, (for we suffer ourselves willingly to be drawn away from recollections that touch the heart where it has been wounded,) when my spiritual friend approached and stood beside me. Oh, said I, that the passage from one world to another were as practicable for me as it is for you! Were there a way, such as John Bunyan saw in his delightful dream, more pilgrims would set out on the journey than ever, in the ages when pilgrimages were most frequent, travelled to Compostella or Jerusalem. Sure I am that I should have begun my progress staff in hand, as soon as I was able to carry a wallet.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In that case I suppose you would stop by the way to throw a stone or two at poor old Giant Pope, as you passed his den.

MONTESINOS.

Nay, if he were lying still in his den, he might lie undisturbed by me. But when he rouses himself like a giant refreshed with wine, and endeavours again to obtain footing in a country from which he was with such great difficulty expelled, then indeed it is time for every one to provide himself with stones who knows how to use a sling. But, applying that happiest and most popular of all allegorical tales (whether in prose or rhyme) to my own wayfare, my pilgrimage has thus far been happily accomplished. I have climbed the Hill of Difficulty. I made no tarriance at Vanity Fair. I have escaped from Doubting Castle; and here I am, literally as well as allegorically, among the Delectable Mountains.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And though you have not engaged in a single combat with Apollyon, you have used him almost as scurvily as he was treated by Martin Luther himself.

MONTESINOS.

I confess to having made free with his tail and his hoofs and his horns. The vulgar demonology of the monks kept its ground among us, when they and their demi-gods were sent packing; and it has done far more harm than can possibly arise from the attempts at representing the Deity, gross and reprehensible as they are, which are still so common in Roman-Catholic countries. What my opinion is concerning the existence, and what speculations I have sometimes entertained concerning the agency of spirits, good or evil, was stated to you in our first conversation, when I little suspected with whom I was conversing. In treating the monkish devil as a mere mythological personage, I have done no disservice to religion. I had once an intention of displaying that whole system of fable in some poems: your friend Erasmus would have been pleased with the design, I think; and, had we been contemporaries, would have encouraged me to execute it, supposing it could have been done with safety.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Had you lived in his days, I know no person who would have savoured more strongly of the frying-pan, as that beast Bishop Nix used to say, than yourself.

MONTESINOS.

That must have depended upon circumstances. Had it been my fortune to have associated with Bilney, or Tindal and Frith, I might have partaken their zeal and their fate. On the other hand, had I been acquainted with you and Cuthbert Tonal, it is not less likely that I should have received the stamp of your opinions. Even the mere difference of age might have decided whether I should have died at the stake to promote the Reformation, or have exerted myself as you did in opposing it. You yourself, had you been twenty years younger, would have been a reformer. In youth we are for pressing forward toward some distant benefit, which is imaginary, and perhaps unattainable: years bring with them experience and warning, and as we advance in life the apprehension of evil becomes stronger than the hope of good. The Reformation brought with it so much evil and so much good, . . . such monstrous corruptions existed on the one part, and such perilous consequences were certainly foreseen on the other, . . . that I do not wonder at the fiery intolerance which was displayed on both sides.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It were a vain speculation to inquire whether the benefits might have been attained without the evils of that long and dreadful process. Such an assumption would be absurd, even as the subject of a political romance. For if men were in a state of morals and knowledge which made them capable of conducting such a revolution unerringly, they would attempt no alteration, because it would be palpable that none was needed. Convulsions of this kind are the consequence and the punishment of our errors and our vices: it is seldom that they prove the remedy for them. The very qualities which enable men to acquire power in distempered times render them, for the most part, unfit to be trusted with it. The work which requires a calm, thoughtful and virtuous spirit, can never be performed by the crafty, the turbulent and the audacious.

MONTESINOS.

The result of our Reformation is of such transcendant good, that it has been well purchased. We have gained by it a scriptural religion; a system of belief which bears inquiry; and an ecclesiastical establishment, which is not merely in all respects consistent with the general good, but eminently and essentially conducive to it.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The present good is certain: but the end of a process must be seen before an opinion can be pronounced upon its result. The Reformation is not yet three hundred years old: and you will allow that it is in no very hopeful way in the country where it originated. Look at it throughout Protestant Germany; you will find it starved by the state, betrayed by its own ministers, and losing ground every day to the old religion on one hand, and the new irreligion on the other.

MONTESINOS.

Thank God! there is no disposition in the British government to starve it, nor is it likely here to be betrayed by those who are engaged in its service.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You admit then the other danger?

MONTESINOS.

Not perhaps from either cause singly; but both have certainly their weight as parts of that Unholy Alliance which is formed against the Establishment.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Three centuries have not elapsed since that Establishment was settled upon its present basis: an Establishment positively good, and comparatively excellent; if not the best that might be conceived, incomparably the best that the world has ever yet seen: and one of its advantages is, that it is capable of admitting without danger or inconvenience all the improvement which it requires. Yet during the short time of its existence (for short the time is in the history of human institutions) it has been subverted once, and was preserved from a second overthrow only by a political revolution, which has shaken the foundation of civil obedience. You must not wonder then if we, who foresaw this tendency in part, withstood to the utmost of our power so perilous a change.

MONTESINOS.

I have never confounded such men as yourself and Tonstal with Gardiner, Bonner, and the pack of hell-hounds whom they hallooed to the chase.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Bonner was a monster of barbarity; Stephen Gardiner a time-serving politician, with a hard head and a harder heart. Some of the rest were as you describe them, dogs, of the Devil's own pack. For myself, and those who acted upon views and feelings which accorded with mine, our acts of persecution are, like Cranmer's, not less to be pitied than condemned. Both are incapable of defence, but the same considerations which must be allowed to explain his conduct, will in some degree extenuate ours. We clearly discerned the consequences of those perilous errors, political as well as religious, which, springing up with the Reformation, accompanied its course, disgraced its progress, prevented its universal extension, impeded its beneficial effects, aggravated its evils, and at length drew upon this poor country the guilt and the miseries of rebellion and revolution. Think you that the venom has spent itself, or is worn out? Graves when they have been opened have let abroad the infection which for generations they had covered. This plague has not been buried. It is still quick and stirring; and well will it be if the present age should not see its ravages recommenced.

MONTESINOS.

There is certainly at this time a more formidable combination acting against the church, than has ever in any former age assailed it. But as certainly the church has never been so well prepared for withstanding it, though I do not mean to assert that she has any such champions to stand forth in her defence as Jewel, or Laud, or Barrow, or South, who had the strongest arm that ever wielded a sledge hammer in this kind of warfare.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Montesinos, it was not a sledge hammer that he wielded! His weapon was a sword of finer materials, truer temper and more exquisite workmanship, than was ever forged on Vulcan's anvil by the Cyclops, by Dwarfs in their subterranean abodes, or by Enchanter or Fairy in romance.

MONTESINOS.

It was not in the Limbo, Sir Thomas, that you found South's Sermons. Have you then libraries in that world of yours, which is as it were the suburbs of the New Jerusalem, . . the vestibule of Heaven? Or are you sometimes busier in our terrestrial collections, than their owners, and those who ought to make use of them? Were I to go into my study at midnight, should I find books on the table, laid there by invisible hands to be perused by invisible eyes, which supply their own light? Or can you see into a volume without opening its pages, as you can enter the room when the doors and windows are shut? . . . Oh that provoking smile, . . and that tantalizing silence! These are not secrets of the prison-house into which I would pry!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But palaces as well as prisons have their secrets: and were it otherwise, should I not rather in tenderness keep silence, than destroy the pleasant fancy you are ready to entertain, that when you come into the next world you will find there an edition of your own works, printed at the Paradise Press?

MONTESINOS.

Tell me that I shall find the lost histories of antiquity there; and the concluding books of the Faery Queen!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Let what you know suffice, and deduce from it what inferences may amuse you best. You will find the poet himself, and as many of the historians as are not in a worse place. But not a few of the latter class have followed the allotment of those whose achievements they recorded; for the guilt of eulogizing or apologizing for wicked actions, is second only to that of committing them... But to the matter of our discourse. Who are the parties that compose this combination against the Establishment, and what are their views?

MONTESINOS.

It is composed of parties and sects who have no other bond of union than the common desire of overthrowing what they all hate worse than they hate each other. Their mutual hatred is qualified by mutual contempt; but their enmity to the Church is embittered in some by a sense of reluctant respect, and by envy in all. If we regard those whose hostility is open and avowed, we shall find three distinct parties, the Dissenters, the Roman-Catholics, and the Unbelievers.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Is it possible that your laws should suffer the Unbelievers to subsist as a party?

vetitum est adeo sceleri nihil?

MONTESINOS.

They avow themselves in defiance of the laws. The fashionable doctrine which the press at this time maintains is, that this is a matter in which the laws ought not to interfere, every man having a right both to form what opinion he pleases upon religious subjects, and to promulgate that opinion. This party is the most daring of the three. It would be difficult to say which is the most active, or the most inveterate. The Roman-Catholics aim at supplanting the Establishment; they expect to do this presently in Ireland, and trust ultimately to succeed in this country also, a consummation for which they look with as much confidence, and as little reason, as the Jews for their Messiah. No branch of the Dissenters can hope to stand in place of the Church, but all desire to pull it down, for the sake of gratifying an inherited hatred, and getting each what it can in the scramble. The Infidels look for nothing less than the extirpation of Christianity. And, widely opposite as their views are, the two latter parties know they are labouring for the promotion of their own designs when they exert all their endeavours to bring about what is falsely called Catholic Emancipation.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Therapeutics were in a miserable state as long as practitioners proceeded upon the gratuitous theory of elementary complexions; and in my days, as among the ancients, natural philosophy was no better, being a mere farrago of romance, founded upon idle tales, or fanciful conjectures, not upon observation and experiment. The science of politics is just now in the same stage: it has been erected by shallow sophists upon abstract rights and imaginary compacts, without the slightest reference to habits and history; but in ignorance of the one, and contempt of the other.

MONTESINOS.

And when men begin to practise confidently upon a false hypothesis, whether it be upon the natural system, or the body politic, we know what perilous consequences are to be apprehended. Our present danger is not so much from these parties, singly or united, active and intriguing as they are, as it is from men who, with the best intentions, and the sincerest attachment to the constitution, as indivisibly consisting of church and state, act nevertheless upon this question, as if they disregarded all the lessons of history. They believe that the spirit of the Roman-Catholic religion is changed, because the Roman-Catholics tell them so.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Which you do not believe.

MONTESINOS.

No, by St. Barthomew, and Dr. Lingard! No, by St. Dominic, and Dr. Doyle! No, by the Holy Office! by the Irish Massacre, and the Dragonades of Louis XIV! By their Saints, and by our Martyrs! Persecution is so plainly a duty upon the Roman-Catholic system, that the live bonfires of the Inquisition were called Acts of Faith.*

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You then are not one of those persons who think that the age of persecution is gone by?

MONTESINOS.

Sir Thomas, you well know there are certain

* Autos-da-fe. The populace may very probably have understood the word Auto in this combination as meaning a spectacle or show, . . . for such it was made to them. I have conversed with persons who remembered when an Auto-da-fe was the greatest holyday in Lisbon, and they who lived where the execution could be seen made entertainments, and invited their friends to the sight!

principles which render persecution a religious duty ; and so long as those principles exist, persecution is only suspended for want of the power to persecute. I know not any excess that is not at this day possible in Ireland. In Spain, nothing would make Ferdinand more popular with one part of his people than an auto-da-fe, and willing enough he would be to indulge them with such a holyday, if he were not in too much fear of the other. And in France, see what the temper of the clergy is, though so many causes have operated there to mitigate it ! Look at the barbarous inhumanity which is displayed there upon the death of a heretic ; and the scandalous scenes which more than once have occurred in Paris concerning the interment of an actor.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Surely you do not suppose that this temper is confined to the Catholics ?

MONTESINOS.

Certainly not. When I see a Calvinist apologizing for the death of Servetus, I think it well for the Unitarians that the disciples of Calvin have not succeeded to his authority as well as to his disposition. These are men to whom Orinda's verses may be well applied :

Ye narrow souls, take heed,
Lest you restrain the mercy you will need !

And when I find them eulogizing, as models of wisdom and piety, the saints of the great rebellion, who were the most pestilent firebrands that ever set a kingdom in flames, I cannot help inferring that, if opportunity were afforded, they would not be backward in imitating what they admire and applaud. ‘Misbelief,’ says the excellent Jackson*, ‘always includes a strong belief; but the stronger our belief, he proceeds to say, the more dangerous it is, if it be wrested or misplaced.’ But the principle of intolerance is not so essentially connected with any other form of belief as it is with the Romish system, nor is it where it exists so practical. The supremacy of the state is acknowledged by all reformed churches: on the contrary the Romish clergy exalt themselves above the state, and make the civil magistrate their executioner. They must persecute, if they believe their own creed, for conscience sake; and if they do not believe it, they must persecute for policy, because it is only by intolerance that so corrupt and injurious a system can be upheld. ‘Smite them for the love of charity!’ was the hearty war-cry of the Bishop, Don Hieronymo, when, in company with my Cid, he hewed among the Moors to the right and left, wielding his sword with both hands, till, as he lifted his arm, the blood ran from the sleeve of his mail to the elbow. ‘ Burn them for the love of charity!’ has been the substance of every sermon that ever was preached at a Roman-Catholic Act of Faith, where a sermon has always been part of the ceremony :... so dreadful are the effects of a strong faith malignified.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It was said of old that the Devil divides the world between atheism and superstition.

MONTESINOS.

France is at this time divided between them. The men, throughout the higher and half-educated classes, believe in Voltaire ; the women, the whole of the lower class, and the court are as obedient to the priestly power, as Pope Hildebrand could have desired to see them, were he to be raised from the dead, and reassume his papal authority. There the two partitioning principles are opposed to each other, and the reign of sacerdotal intolerance cannot be re-established without a struggle of which the issue would be doubtful.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Do you apprehend then that a renewal of religious persecution is likely, or possible, in any other part of Christendom?

MONTESINOS.

I know not what evils are impossible when I consider the credulity and the mutability, and the ignorance of mankind. There is, however, no immediate prospect of it. In Italy atheism and superstition compromise matters, and in Spain also they have come to the same sort of tacit understanding; persecution has done its work in both countries, and the fires have gone out, not for want of will to keep them up, but because the fuel has been all consumed: no antagonizing spirit of belief is left. They who are of Leo the Tenth's religion, and they who are of Ignatius Loyola's, share the temporal things of the church between them in brotherly concord, and the only heresy to be found is that which exists in political opinions. The unbelieving clergy are better than the ultra-believing in this respect, that if a religious heretic were to present himself, they would be very unwilling to gratify him in his desire for martyrdom.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

To what do you ascribe this reluctance?

MONTESINOS.

Mainly to natural humanity, manifesting itself when not counteracted by any apparent interest, or strong persuasion : and in no slight part also to a sense of the obloquy which such things have brought upon the papal church, and to the secret and reluctant respect which is paid even in Rome itself to the opinion of protestant Europe : but this is felt more in Italy than in Spain, where the people live more in a world of their own, and where there are still friars who would exult in renewing their burnt offerings as of old. Superstition has struck deep roots in Belgium also, and in catholic Germany ; but there too unbelief exists in alliance with it.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The difference is sufficiently observable, that in protestant countries infidelity declares itself, and forms its societies, if not its factions ; whereas, under a catholic establishment, it goes to mass, keeps a formal account with the confessor, takes its full sway in youth and middle age, and ends by applying to the priest for cordials and opiates at last.

MONTESINOS.

France offers the only exception to this at present, because infidelity was a fashion there before the Revolution, and has since formed for itself a faction. But if Jesuitism keep the ground which it has gained in that country, the higher rank of unbelievers will soon be in league with it, in outward appearance, and in policy. There is a root of bigotry in the Bourbon race which may bring forth bitter fruits.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

One of the popes* called France the quiver from whence Christ would draw those chosen arrows which were to subdue the nations and kingdoms of the earth unto himself.

MONTESINOS.

This is a prediction of which the Jesuits have not failed to remind the Bourbon kings. The princes of that blood may be libertines in youth, but they are bigots by inheritance, and cannot become otherwise without a sacrifice of family feeling, which it would require no ordinary sense of duty and strength of conviction to overcome. They are brought up to worship their ancestor St. Louis, to admire the triumph of the Romish faith in the conversion of Henri IV., and to believe that Louis le Grand performed a religious duty when he revoked the edict of Nantes, and carried on a persecution

P. Richeome quotes this from Pope Gregory IX.

more odious in its nature, as well as more wicked in its commencement, than any of former times. But from the unhappy principles which are thus inculcated, there arises a sentiment of pride in supporting a system to which their family is, as it were, thus pledged; and where there is this feeling to combine with that ambitious policy which the kings of France must always entertain, till the wisdom which is not of this world shall prevail in the councils of princes, it may reasonably be apprehended that they will take the first opportunity of exciting and fomenting a religious rebellion in Ireland; . . a design in which the Court of Rome would co-operate with more sincerity, than actuated it in its transactions with James II.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It is to prevent this design, and render it impracticable by tranquillizing Ireland, that the admission of the Roman-Catholics to political power is advised by some of your statesmen. Is it the wisdom of their advice, or the sincerity that you doubt?

MONTESINOS.

I deny the wisdom; and in the greater part of those by whom the advice is supported, I doubt the sincerity. The persons who are thus labouring to effect ' that mischief which never

'foreign enemy could bring to pass,' may be classed and characterized in the words of Queen Elizabeth. There are 'first the broachers and 'workers thereof, who are in the greatest fault; 'secondly, the speakers, who by eloquent tales 'persuaded others, are in the next degree; 'thirdly, the agreeers, who were so light of belief, 'that the eloquence of the tales soon overcame 'them, and they gave more credit thereunto than 'unto their own wits.' . . . There, Sir Thomas, was a sovereign, whom you were worthy to have served, and in serving whom you would have found your heart's content! As her chancellor, had you been born forty years later, your head would have lain easily on its pillow, and sat safely on its shoulders.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And you, had you been her subject, would have celebrated her in pastoral and epic verse, Happily she had no want of statesmen, or of poets.

MONTESINOS.

It was the glorious age of both. Augustus himself had no such poet to sing his praises, as the one who said that Elizabeth should be

A pattern to all princes living with her,

And all that shall succeed.

There are four days which ought to be religiously observed in these kingdoms as national holydays, for thanksgiving and joy: that on which Magna Charta was obtained, Queen Elizabeth's accession, that of the Restoration of the Monarchy, and that on which the Prince of Orange landed at Torbay.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Those days indeed have rendered England what it is, in civil and religious and intellectual freedom. But what days would you appoint for the national holydays of Ireland?

MONTESINOS.

Alas, those are yet to come! But of the days that are past, there are two which should be marked with black in the Irish Kalendar, . . . that on which the elective franchise was given to the Roman-Catholics, and that in which a Protestant Government gave its sanction and support to a seminary for the Romish Priesthood. I know not which was the insaner measure. The other evils with which that poor country has been so long afflicted, are not imputable to the English government, or at most only for its sufferance of them: but these are of its own creation.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Is sufferance then of this kind so light a fault,

and are acts of omission to be esteemed so venial?

MONTESINOS.

You reprehend me justly;..but it is only the inconsiderate expression that has exposed a well-considered meaning to this reprehension. What I would say is that (these flagrant instances excepted) England has in its own history some excuse for the want of policy which has been so grievously shown in the government of Ireland.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The want of policy may be explained thus, and therefore, to a certain degree, excused. The conquest of that island was a thing of accident and adventure, and as it had been gained, so it was long kept: what better could be expected during the miserable reigns of John Lackland, and his imbecil son? The ambitious and able prince who succeeded had objects of nearer interest to engage his chief attention, so the settlement and improvement of Ireland were left to the slow process of feudal subjugation. But herein the English did not succeed in Ireland as the Normans had done in England; because the present authority of a King was wanting, and because the people were not in the same grade of civilization with themselves; for which reason, the same intermixture, which had formed the Normans and the Saxons into one nation, could not take place. That union had not been effected here till after long struggles and grievous suffering, though there was unity of purpose here in a strong and remorseless conqueror, who was succeeded also by princes not inferior to him in decision and force of character. In Ireland, both the unity and the strength were wanting. Here, too, the institutions of the old inhabitants and of the invaders resembled each other sufficiently to be easily combined, and the languages, though widely different, were, in like manner, capable of combination. But in Ireland the people were of a different race; the languages so essentially unlike, that no mixed speech should grow out of them; and the only thing in common between the native Irish and the settlers was their profession of a religion which had little or no influence upon the conduct of either.

MONTESINOS.

It resembled, therefore, in this respect, the Saxon rather than the Norman conquest of England, . . for in the former the inhabitants were not subdued and incorporated, but exterminated, or, more accurately speaking, displaced.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Both the people and the country were wilder, and, therefore, less easily to be subdued. The Britons were a civilized race, weakened by habits of long subjection, as well as by recent circumstances, and left without a government when they were in no condition to form one for themselves; thus they were overcome by a people, barbarous indeed, but far advanced above the savage state, and whose system of society and habits of life were essentially warlike. The Baltic tribes, moreover, came not merely as invaders but as settlers; . . . they moved, like the Helvetians in Cæsar's time, not as armies but as nations, with their wives and families, and took possession of the country, there to increase and multiply, and replenish the land as well as to subdue it. The Britons, after a long and brave struggle, retreated to the mountains, and being separated by those natural boundaries from the Northmen who successively established themselves in the more fertile and less defensible parts of the island, they became more and more barbarous during a long course of civil dissensions, while their neighbours were consolidating their strength, and improving in all things, . . . till at length the broken and divided nation yielded to a conquest which brought with it no evil and entailed no regret. The English settlement in Ireland was begun by a handful of adventurers, and the country was full of those fastnesses which are impediments in the way, not only of conquest but of civilization. The greater part of those adventurers intermarried with the native women, . . . the mother tongue prevailed among their posterity to a greater extent than might have been expected, and the native character was imbibed, when the more civilized one should have been superinduced.

MONTESINOS.

Hibernis ipsis Hiberniores* they were said to have become.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Yet, with all disadvantages of misgovernment, the English for three centuries went on steadily in the work of subduing the land, and settling the parts which they subdued. But when the House of York asserted by arms its claim to the crown, the wars which ensued, dreadful as they were to England, proved in their consequence far more injurious to Ireland. For the chief persons among the settlers gathered what force

* How Irish this was, Spenser tells us was expressed by an odd proverb concerning O'Hanlan, in which it appears what was considered the most Irish part of O'Hanlan himself.

they could and crost to England, there to support their party, and look to the protection of their English estates; and in thus withdrawing them, York, who had done much good in Ireland by an able and beneficent administration, entailed upon it great and lasting evils; for the unsubjected natives, who were at that time confined to the mountains, and there so straitened, that their condition is described by saying they lived only upon white meats, took the opportunity which was afforded them, and recovered the greater part of their country; their countrymen, who were settling into habits of better life, joined them, and relapsed at once into their old barbarity; and the lands which were thus repossessed by the Irish, were presently reduced to a wilder state than that in which the English had found them. The York and Lancaster wars endured long enough for them to keep what they had thus gained, and to gather strength there. Henry VII., in the early part of his reign, neglected Ireland, expecting a more convenient season for setting its disturbed affairs in order; by this improvidence, he brought upon himself some troubles which might otherwise have been spared; for the Yorkites received Lambert Simnel there, crowned him in Dublin, and raised a force with which they invaded England in his behalf. Other cares engrossed Henry in the latter part of his reign: till his time the state of England had been such, . . always engaged in foreign wars or domestic troubles, . . that no system of wise and prospective policy for Ireland could have been expected; but thus it happened that that ill-fated island derived no benefit from a reign which effected so much good for this, and prepared so much more. Then came the Reformation.

MONTESINOS.

That great event has produced unmingled evil in Ireland, and in no other country. Every where else, whether the Romish religion succeeded in keeping out the spirit of reform, or in extinguishing it after a struggle, more or less benefit was derived; but in Ireland evil, and only evil has resulted. Here, it must be admitted, there has been some mournful misgovernment, some sin of omission with which England is to be charged.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

It would be well, perhaps, if there prevailed in all things the same principle of taking always the favourable view of a case, . . the side inclining to mercy, . . which is acted upon in the English criminal law. You would impute to the English government, as its greatest error, its neglect in taking any adequate measures for establishing the reformed religion as effectually in Ireland, as in England. But reflect upon the history of the times, and you will then perceive how difficult or how impossible it was that this should have been done. How was the Reformation in its first age to have been introduced among the wild Irish, as they were called, and as a long series of barbarizing circumstances had made them? Preachers, no doubt, would have found their way among them, if there had not been employment at home for all the zeal and enthusiasm that were called into action, or if a gift of tongues had not been necessary for the work; without that gift the reformers could do nothing there; and there was at least this excuse for not translating the Bible into Irish when the English version was set forth, that there were few, or none, of those for whom it was designed, who could have read it.

MONTESINOS.

This indeed was felt as one great obstacle, after the New Testament and the Liturgy had been translated for their use. And when a translation of the Bible was undertaken under the superintendence and at the cost of Bedell, that admirable prelate, whose name should never be pronounced without reverence, required his clergy to establish schools in every parish, as a preliminary measure, without which the version would be useless.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Before the Irish could be reformed, it was necessary to civilize them, and that task was rendered more difficult than ever, when to the old causes of enmity, difference of religion was superadded. A greater obstacle to civilization and union was then presented than in all former ages, and one which could have been overcome by nothing short of an effectual conquest of the island when the first great rebellion took place.

MONTESINOS.

The wisdom to perceive this was not wanting in Elizabeth's councils; but she was crippled for want of means, as her formidable enemy the Spaniard had been, and to a greater degree. Had the resources which her father squandered been at her command, the rebellion would have been speedily suppressed, and such measures pursued as should have prevented its recurrence. But she had succeeded to an exhausted treasury; the people too had been impoverished by the consequences of the persecution so relentlessly carried on in the preceding reign. The frugality of her own establishment could not compensate for the want of an adequate revenue; the sale of her jewels was of more avail in proving to the people her unwillingness to burthen them with imposts, than in defraying an expenditure which unavoidable circumstances necessarily increased; and the sale of lands to which she was reduced, weakened the crown far more than it relieved the people. The heaviest expenses of her reign were occasioned by Ireland; but they were always insufficient, and thus the struggle was prolonged: the evil, which by vigorous exertion might have been effectually removed, was rendered permanent: religion, or what usurped its place and its name, was connected with false pride, mistaken patriotism, hereditary hatred; it became a bond of faction, a principle of rebellion: such it was left by Elizabeth, . . . and such it is at this day.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You have excused Elizabeth's* government.

* Bacon says in a letter to Cecil, that 'the causes of Ireland, if they be taken by the right handle,' presented the best grounds for an action 'of sound honour and merit to her majesty and this crown, without ventosity and popularity, that the riches of any occasion, or the tide of any opportunity, can possibly minister or offer.' But this was not written till the end of Elizabeth's reign.

See whether some grounds of exculpation, which are equally valid, may not be found for later times.

MONTESINOS.

There was, however, in Elizabeth's councils a want of consistent and vigorous policy towards Ireland. Lord Grey was prevented by court intrigues from completing the work which he had almost brought to an end. His measures, had they been pursued, would have prevented Tyrone's rebellion: and, during that rebellion, an ill-timed economy placed every thing in such hazard, that with all the Queen's just confidence in the courage of her troops, and in the ability of their commander, and with all her firmness, there was a time when she must have trembled for the result. Of all the worthies of her reign, or perhaps of English history, Mountjoy is the one whose celebrity has been least in proportion to his merits. Cavendish and Drake and Essex are popular names, while his is popularly at this day unknown; though Great Britain has never produced a man of more heroic character, nor one to whom she is indebted for a more essential service. He too was not supplied with means for carrying into effect the measures which he proposed. But he did so much that James was enabled to proceed upon a system of gentle and conciliatory policy, congenial to that temper and those intentions, which deservedly obtained for him, when he was beyond the reach of flattery, the epithets of the Peaceful and the Just. More progress in the civilization of Ireland was made during James's reign, than in all the years which had elapsed since its conquest, or than in any other assignable age of its history; and the counties which were then planted are at this time* the most flourishing, the best affected, and consequently the least disturbed parts of that poor, miserable country.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

...A country from which half a century of efficient government, conducted upon the plainest principles of good policy, would remove its miseries, and with them the reproach which, so long as they are permitted to continue, rests upon England. But proceed to examine where that reproach begins, and for how much England is responsible before God and man.

MONTESINOS.

The condition of Ireland continued to improve till the Puritans obtained the ascendancy in * Digest of the Evidence on the State of Ireland, vol. i. pp 41—49.

England : and then the intolerance of that odious faction gave the Romish priests occasion for alarming the fears of the Irish, while they worked upon their superstition and their national feeling. France and Spain were not backward in ill offices towards Great Britain ; the former from old rivalry, the latter for its sincere devotion to the Romish Church. The Rebellion broke out, and whoever is acquainted with the dreadful history that ensued, will not wonder at the measure of vengeance which Cromwell exacted, nor that penal laws should have been framed against the professors of a religion which had served as the pretext and incitement and watchword for the Irish massacre.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

After Cromwell's conquest, might not any thing have been effected in a country where the whole fabric of society had been overthrown, . . and all its boundaries and landmarks as it were swept away and effaced ?

MONTESINOS.

The convulsion and consequent confusion had indeed been such, that one, who holds no mean rank among theoretical politicians, seriously thought the best arrangement which could have been made for Ireland would have been to assign it over to the Jews, and allow them to establish themselves there as a nation, holding under Great Britain by an annual payment of two millions sterling.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The proposer must have been more sincere in his political opinions than in his Christian faith, if he supposed that under any mere worldly arrangement the Children of Israel could be gathered together, and subsist collectively as a people.

MONTESINOS.

How that may have been you may satisfy yourself, for the legislators of Utopia and Oceana can be no strangers to each other in the Intermediate State. Next to the happiness of being re-united in that State to the objects of our love, must be the pleasure of seeking out the kindred spirits of other ages, and conversing face to face with those whose actions we have admired, to whose lives and death we have been beholden, from whose works we have derived instruction, or whose examples we have endeavoured to follow. I know not what religious tenets were held by Harrington, but that he is now with the spirits of 'just men made perfect,' I entertain no doubt. His speculations were harmless and benevolent even when they ceased to be sane; and if the cooler heads of that age had been regulated by as clear a conscience, it had been happy for Great Britain then, and perhaps for themselves now. The project of selling Ireland to the Jews was the wildest of all Harrington's notions. Had Cromwell possessed the will to put in execution any ideal scheme of government, the power was wanting; for when his strong mind had emancipated itself from the thralldom of error and prejudice, he found himself fettered in the chain of his own misdeeds. What he did in Ireland was done without remorse; he established order there with a strong hand; but at the Restoration all was undone. For the restored government was beset with incompatible interests and conflicting obligations; the evil which had been committed it could but imperfectly redress, while the good which was in progress was destroyed, . . . necessarily, for the sake of justice and humanity.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

This then arose, not from perverse policy, nor even from any error of judgment, but from a combination of circumstances which in human language might be called fatal.

MONTESINOS.

The circumstances were such that there was no possible course by which great injustice and great evil could be avoided. The settlement of the perplexed affairs of Ireland was so difficult, that Clarendon has told us he made it his humble suit to the King that no part of it might ever be referred to him; and Ormond, who of all men had fullest knowledge of the subject and most personal concern in it, 'could not see any light in so much darkness that might lead him to any beginning.'* A settlement, however, such as it was, was made: the guilty, who had so managed as to secure their own interests in the arrangement, and the loyal sufferers, who had been left with their sufferings for their reward, were removed by the course of years; the commercial towns partook of English industry, and flourished accordingly; and they, who had till then been called the wild Irish, seem at this time to have lost that appellation, perhaps in consequence of having laid aside their wild costume of the glib and mantle, which were never resumed after Cromwell's terrible proscription. But the plants of civilization did not thrive like the old weeds of the soil. When the national dress, if dress it might be called, had disappeared, the habits of mind remained unchanged. New laws had been made, but the inveterate spirit of lawlessness existed in full force. No endeavours were used for effecting that religious reformation upon which the peace and security of Ireland must be founded; and the Court of Rome exerted its influence almost as openly during the reign of Charles and his brother as during the rebellion, and far more dangerously. Then came the Revolution, which made Ireland the seat of war, and left there its long train of evil consequences. From that time Great Britain may be charged with misgovernment towards that country.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Look to the causes which occasioned that misgovernment, and see to what extent they may be considered as excusing it. Men judge wiseliest, when they judge most charitably.

MONTESINOS.

There can be no surer rule in regarding the history of the past; but it would be no safe principle for the conduct of present affairs. While this world is what it is, Suspicion must not be allowed to sleep at Wisdom's gates,* for if her charge be resigned to Simplicity, the robber will enter in. William, our deliverer, neither intended nor inflicted wrong in Ireland; but from the sin of omission in its relations with that country, the British government in his days cannot be acquitted. His was an uneasy life; nor can we wonder that he, who during his whole reign was engaged in a continued struggle for the land of his birth and the kingdom which had adopted him, for the liberties of Europe and for the Protestant cause, should have regarded the affairs of Ireland as matters of inferior moment, which might stand over till a more convenient season. Under his successor there were the same all-important interests at stake abroad, and at home there were miserable intrigues, so base in their origin, so traitorous in their progress, so injurious in their consequences, that they have rendered Queen Anne's reign in one point of view as disgraceful, as it is glorious in another. Then came the House of Brunswick, and with its accession the happiest age of England began; but Ireland was still neglected, when there was no longer the excuse of more urgent duties for neglecting it.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The race of statesmen had then become extinct among you. The two first monarchs of that House were in their habits of mind, as well as by birth and education, foreigners, and they were transplanted too late in life ever to become intellectually or morally naturalized in their new country. You have said truly that that age was the happiest in English history, looking at its exemption from foreign or domestic troubles. At the same time, in whatever point of view it may be regarded, it is the least honourable. In no other half century was there so little written for posterity, or so little done that was worthy of remembrance. Manners were coarse ; morals low ; public probity a jest. Sound learning had almost disappeared. Ecclesiastical preferment was ill bestowed. Even the military character of the nation was ill supported ; the army was in the worst state of discipline, for the spirit of jobbing and speculation extended to every thing. The English seemed to have no other ambition left than that of being a trading people, and that upon the narrowest principles of shortsighted selfishness. That your institutions should have recovered from this general putrescence is the strongest proof of their vital force. There had been a tendency to this corruption from the time of the Great Rebellion, for political revolutions always loosen the moral cement of society. After a generation, in which great sacrifices have been made to principles of civil or religious duty, the sense of either seems almost to be worn out. At such times Mammon finds the heart of a nation swept and garnished to receive him ! Conscience has been rendered torpid, honour is set at nought, and the most opposite factions agree in acknowledging the goodliness of gain.

MONTESINOS.

The grievances of which Ireland complained in that age, arose exclusively from the blind system of trading selfishness. Against these it was that Swift raised his powerful voice. They have been removed, and Ireland would have partaken at this day, like Scotland, its full share of civilization and prosperity with the sister kingdom, had it, like Scotland, been every where subjected to the laws, and had not the most flagrant mispolicy been shown towards the Romanists ; for what greater error could a government commit than that of conferring political privileges upon a class of freeholders who had no expectations of them, no pretensions to them upon any grounds of common policy, common convenience, or common sense ; . . . and giving encouragement to a priesthood, who are the confederated and sworn enemies of that religion which is the corner-stone of the British constitution ?

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Your age has not advanced more in chemical and mechanical science, and in promoting the comforts and luxuries of life for the classes to whose lot comforts and luxuries fall, than it has gone backward in some of the most essential points of polity. As there is no error more prevalent, so is there none more dangerous, than the doctrine which is so sedulously inculcated, that the state ought not to concern itself with the religion of the subjects, . . . whereas religion is the only foundation of society, and governments which have not this basis are built upon sand.

MONTESINOS.

Our ancestors knew this, and therefore they fenced the constitution with those ramparts which evil counsellors are exciting the present generation to throw down. I will not say that our church is perfect, . . . what earthly institution is so? I will not say that it stands in no need of improvement; but the world has never yet seen any other establishment in itself so good, and so beneficial in its results; nor is there any defect in it which may not safely be removed and easily repaired. The religion of England is the great charter of its intellectual freedom. But the principle of intolerance was not more desperately pursued by all parties in your age, nor more absolutely proclaimed by the Saints of the Rebellion, than the nature of toleration is mistaken, and the principle abused, by men of this generation, who by the courtesy of England are called statesmen.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Have the Irish Roman-Catholic clergy deserved so well of the British government that they have a fair claim to encouragement and support from it?

MONTESINOS.

So long as there existed a claimant to the British crown in one of the Stuart line, they kept up a treasonable communication with that claimant; their Prelates were nominated by him, and the doctrine which they maintained was that of the Divine Right of Kings*. After that unhappy family became extinct, and Great Britain was engaged in war with revolutionary France, the principle with which they then allied their religion was that of the Rights of Man. During the war with Buonaparte, and at a time when that most formidable enemy with whom this nation ever contended was in the height of his pride and power, the Irish Roman-Catholic Prelates voluntarily declared their acceptance of the Concordat, which ratified by papal authority his usurpation, and the deposition of the Bourbons. These pontifical acts of Pope Pius VII. they ‘accepted, approved and concurred with, as good, rightful, authentic, and necessary, inspired by charity, and done in the faith of his predecessor.’... These facts may show what their political deserts have been.

* Digest of Evidence, ii. 48. i. 123, 4.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And what meantime have been their moral merits, as evidenced in the fruits of their influence over the people?

MONTESINOS.

‘By their fruits ye shall know them.’ Nowhere, not even in Spain, have the priests so absolute a power over the multitude; and therefore it was that Bishop Berkley addressed an exhortation to them, requesting that they would use this great influence to a beneficial purpose. I need not eulogize Berkley, .. whom you must have seen among the worthies of our country!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

His name is in the Book of Life. A purer spirit never was received into the society of Sages and Saints.

MONTESINOS.

‘You are known,’ said he, to the Irish Roman-Catholic clergy, ‘to have great influence

‘ on the minds of your people; be so good as to ‘ use this influence for their benefit. Since
‘ other methods fail, try what you can do. “ Be ‘ instant in season, out of season, reprove, re‘ buke, exhort,” make them thoroughly sensible
‘ of the sin and folly of sloth. No set of men ‘ upon earth have it in their power to do good on ‘ easier terms, with more advantage to others,
‘ and less pains or losses to themselves. Your ‘ flocks are of all others most disposed to follow ‘ directions, and of all others want them most.’..
‘ Certainly, if I may advise, you should, in ‘ return for the lenity and indulgence of the ‘ government, endeavour to make yourselves ‘ useful to the public; and this will best be per‘ formed by rousing your poor countrymen from ‘ their beloved sloth. I shall not now dispute
‘ the truth or importance of other points, but will ‘ venture to say, that you may still find time to ‘ inculcate this doctrine of an honest industry;
‘ and that this would by no means be time thrown ‘ away, if promoting your country’s interest;
‘ and rescuing so many unhappy wretches of
‘ your countrymen from beggary, or the gallows,
‘ be thought worth your pains.’... ‘ Why should ‘ you, whose influence is greatest, be least active?
‘ Why should you, whose words are most likely ‘ to prevent, say least in the common cause?

‘ You cannot in your sermons do better than ‘ inveigh against idleness, that extensive parent
 ‘ of many miseries and many sins ; idleness, the ‘ mother of hunger and sister of theft ; idleness
 ‘ which, the son of Sirach assures us, “ teacheth
 ‘ many vices.” Were this but done heartily,
 ‘ would you but “ be instant in season and out of ‘ season, reprove, rebuke, exhort,” such is the ‘ ascendant you have gained over the people, that ‘ we might soon expect to see the good effect ‘ thereof. We might hope “ that our garners
 ‘ would soon be full, affording all manner of store,
 ‘ that our sheep would bring forth thousands,
 ‘ that our oxen would be strong to labour, that ‘ there would be no breaking in, nor going out,
 ‘ (no robbery, nor migration for bread,) and that ‘ there would be no complaining in our streets.”
 ‘ It stands upon you to act with vigour in this ‘ cause, and shake off the shackles of sloth from ‘ your countrymen, because there be some who ‘ surmise, that yourselves have put them on.
 ‘ Right or wrong, men will be apt to judge of ‘ your doctrines by their fruits.’

MONTESINOS.

There was no enmity in Berkley’s language, and no unchristian feeling in his heart. Had the Romish clergy hearkened to his exhortations, and exerted themselves for improving the condition of their people, with half the zeal that they display in keeping up an inflammatory excitement among them, the state of Ireland must have been very unlike what it now is, and they themselves would appear in a very different light before God and man.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

They might have wrought as great a change in Ireland as the Jesuits effected among the tribes of Paraguay and California.

MONTESINOS. -

This without opposition, without difficulty, without danger; in the strict line of their duty, ..in the proper discharge of their sacerdotal functions,..to the immediate advancement of their own interest, and so greatly to the furtherance of those ambitious views which the ministers of the Romish church must ever entertain, that I know not how their claims, if supported by such services, could have been resisted. Being masters and keepers of the consciences of men, they might have enforced upon the gentry of their communion the religious duty of dealing equitably and mercifully with the peasants, they might have made them feel what a sin it is to grind the faces of the poor; and they might have brought about there, what they have never in any age attempted, the civil conversion of the lower class, . . a people abounding with generous and grateful feelings, . . who are susceptible above all other people of kindness, but who, nevertheless, are continually committing more unprovoked murders and inhuman crimes than are perpetrated in any other country under the face of heaven. I would not dissemble the merits of the Romish clergy, nor withhold praise from them when it is their due; they attend sedulously to the poor, and administer relief and consolation to them in sickness and death, with exemplary and heroic devotion. Many among them, undoubtedly, there are, whose error is in opinion alone, whose frame of mind is truly Christian, and who, according to the light which they possess, labour faithfully in the service of their Lord. But the condition of Ireland affords full evidence for condemning them as a body. In no other country is their influence so great, and in no other country are so many enormities committed. Those enormities are not acts of individual depravity and guilt; they are part of a system which is the opprobrium and the curse of Ireland, and which extends among their people throughout the island. Now it is certain that the secrets of this atrocious confederacy are not and cannot be hidden from the priests. They are communicated to them under the seal of confession, a seal which the confessor is enjoined to break* when the disclosure relates to heretical opinions, but which is to be kept inviolate in all other cases, murder and treason included. If they know that these in their most horrid form, or terrible extent, are intended, it is a principle with them that they must not give such intimation as might prevent the crime†. There have been Tyburn martyrs in old times for this misprision of treason: and it can be no question of morality how far he who commits a misprision of murder becomes a partaker of the guilt. But without trenching upon this pernicious principle of secrecy, it is in the power of the Romish clergy to draw forth such disclosures as the welfare of the state requires. They are called to the death-bed of those criminals who escape the laws...and to the prison of the far smaller number who are overtaken by earthly justice. It is in their power to require a full disclosure for the purposes of justice as the condition of absolution; and it is their duty to withhold absolution as long as the guilty person persists in withholding a full confession of the schemes in which he has engaged, and the parties concerned in them. Now it is imputable to the constitution of their church, and not to the men, that they impede the natural and wholesome operation of that principle* which God has implanted in the heart of man, and make the penitent, who has whispered his tale in the priest's ear, satisfied with himself, when he would otherwise have no peace until he had made a public confession† which might prevent farther crimes. But this leaving undone what they ought to have done is their own choice; they are free to act; and thus it is that they have acted, and are acting.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

As if a judicial blindness affected them.

MONTESINOS.

With such a mental and moral blindness we may believe that the British and Irish Roman-Catholics have been stricken. They would not else have broken all the pledges which their parliamentary advocates have given in their name, nor have uniformly conducted themselves in the manner most likely to frustrate the unhappy efforts of those advocates in their behalf. They would not else have threatened us with their numbers. The Irish priests could not else have so entirely neglected those obvious duties which it would have been most advantageous for their own designs to have performed. They would not have declared in Ireland their determination to subvert the Established Church*. They would not have proclaimed, that if a rebellion were raging in that country from Carrickfergus to Cape Clear, no sentence of excommunication would ever be fulminated by a Roman-Catholic prelate. This they have done. And the statesmen who persist in recommending that we should conciliate them by conceding all that they demand, may be compared to the

The Ode which is here inserted, because of its relation to the subject of the preceding Colloquy, was written in the winter of 1821-2, a few months after his Majesty's visit to Ireland, and some years before that religious movement had manifested itself there, which may in its consequences, through God's blessing, produce more benefit to that country, than could be effected by any act of human legislation.

I.

How long, O Ireland, from thy guilty ground
Shall innocent blood
Arraign the inefficient arm of Power?
How long shall Murder there,
Leading his banded ruffians thro' the land,
Range unrepress'd?
How long shall Night
Bring to thy harmless dwellers, in the stead
Of natural rest, the feverish sleep of fear,
Midnight alarms,
Horrible dreams, and worse realities?
How long shall darkness cover, and the eye
Of Morning open upon deeds of death?

II.

In vain art thou by liberal Nature's dower
Exuberantly blest;
The Seasons in their course
Shed o'er thy hills and vales
The bounties of a genial clime, in vain;

Heaven hath in vain bestowed
     Well-tempered liberty,
 (Its last and largest boon to social man,)
 If the brute Multitude from age to age,
     Wild as their savage ancestors,
     Go irreclaimed the while,
 From sire to son transmitting still
     In undisturbed descent,
     (A sad inheritance!)
 Their errors, and their crimes.

III.

Green Island of the West!
 Thy Sister Kingdom fear'd not this
     When thine exultant shores
     Rung far and wide of late,
 And grateful Dublin first beheld her King,
     First of thy Sovereigns he
 Who visited thy shores in peace and joy.

IV.

Oh what a joy was there!
 In loud huzzahs prolong'd,
 Surge after surge the tide
     Of popular welcome rose;
     And in the intervals alone
 Of that tumultuous sound of glad acclaim
     Could the deep cannon's voice
 Of duteous gratulation, tho' it spake
     In thunder, reach the ear.

From every tower the merry bells rung round,
    Peal hurrying upon peal,
    Till with the still reverberating din
The walls and solid pavement seem'd to shake,
    And every bosom with the tremulous air
    Inhaled a dizzy joy.

v.

Age that came forth to gaze,
    That memorable day
Felt in its quicken'd veins a pulse like youth ;
And lisping babes were taught to bless their King,
And grandsires bade the children treasure up
    The precious sight ; for it would be a tale
    The which in their old age
Would make their children's children gather round
    Intent, all ears to hear.

vi.

Were then the feelings of that generous time
    Ephemeral as the joy ?
    Pass'd they away like summer clouds,
    Like dreams of infancy,
Like glories of the evening firmament,
    Which fade, and leave no trace ?
Merciful Heaven, oh let not thou the hope
Be frustrate, that our Sister Isle may reap
    From the good seed then sown
    Full harvests of prosperity and peace ;

That perfect union may derive its date
From that auspicious day,
And equitable ages thence
Their lasting course begin !

VII.

Green Island of the West,
While frantic violence delays
That happier order, still must thou remain
In thine own baleful darkness wrapt ;
As if the Eye divine,
That which beholdeth all, from thee alone
In wrath had turn'd away !

VIII.

But not for ever thus shalt thou endure,
To thy reproach, and ours,
Thy misery, and our shame !
For Mercy shall go forth
To stablish Order, with an arm'd right hand ;
And firm Authority
With its all-present strength control the bad,
And with its all-sufficient shield
Protect the innocent :
The first great duty this of lawful Power
Which holds its delegated right from Heaven.

IX.

The first great duty this ; but this not all,
For more than comes within the scope
Of Power, is needed here ;

More than to watch insidious discontent,
 Curb, and keep curb'd the treasonable tongue,
 And quell the madden'd multitude :
     Labours of love remain ; . . .
 To weed out noxious customs rooted deep
 In a rank soil, and long left seeding there ;
 Pour balm into old wounds, and bind them up ;
     Remove remediable ills,
     Improve the willing mind,
     And win the generous heart,
 Afflicted Country, from thyself
     Must this redemption come,
 And thou hast children able to perform
     This work of faith and hope.

X.

Oh for a voice which might recall
     To their deserted hearths
     Thy truant sons ! a voice
     Whose virtuous cogency
 Might with the strength of duty reach their souls ;
 A strength that should compel entire consent,
     And to their glad obedience give
 The impulse and the force of free good-will !
     For who but they can knit
 The severed links of that appointed chain,
     Which when in just cohesion it unites
     Order to order, rank to rank,
     In mutual benefit,
     So binding heart to heart,
 It then connecteth Earth with Heaven, from whence
     The golden links depend.

XI.

Nor when the war is waged
With Error, and the brood
Of Darkness, will your aid
Be wanting in the cause of Light and Love,
Ye Ministers of that most holy Church
Whose firm foundations on the rock
Of Scripture rest secure !
What tho' the Romanist, in numbers strong,
In misdirected zeal
And bigotry's blind force,
Assail your Fortress ; though the sons of Schism
Join in insane alliance with that old Inveterate enemy,
Weening thereby to wreak
Their covenanted hatred, and effect
Your utter overthrow :
What tho' the unbelieving crew,
For fouler purpose aid the unnatural league;
And Faction's wolfish pack
Set up their fiercest yell, to augment
The uproar of assault :
Clad in your panoply will ye be found,
Wielding the spear of Reason with the sword
Of Scripture girt ; and from your shield of Truth
Such radiance shall go forth,
As when, unable to sustain its beams
On Arthur's arm unveil'd,
Earth-born Orgoglio reel'd, as if with wine ;

And from her many-headed beast cast down
Duessa fell, her cup of sorcery spilt,
Her three-crown'd mitre in the dust devolved,
And all her secret filthiness exposed.

XII.

O thou fair Island, with thy Sister Isle
Indissolubly link'd for weal and woe ;
Partaker of her present power,
Her everlasting fame ;
Dear pledges hast thou rendered and received
Of that eternal union ! Bedell's grave
Is in thy keeping ; and with thee
Deposited, doth Taylor's holy dust
Await the Archangel's call.
O land profuse of genius and of worth,
Largely hast thou received, and largely given !

XIII.

Green Island of the West,
The example of unspotted Ormond's faith
To thee we owe ; to thee
Boyle's venerable name :
Berkley the wise, the good :
And that great Orator who first
Unmask'd the harlot sorceress Anarchy
What time, in Freedom's borrowed form profaned,
She to the nations round
Her draught of witchcraft gave :

And him who in the field
O'erthrew her giant offspring in his strength,
And brake the iron rod.
Proud of such debt,
Rich to be thus indebted, these,
Fair Island, Sister Queen
Of Ocean, Ireland, these to thee we owe.

XIV.

Shall I then imprecate
A curse on them that would divide
Our union? . . Far be this from me, O Lord!
Far be it! What is man,
That he should scatter curses? . . King of Kings,
Father of all, Almighty, Governor
Of all things, unto Thee
Humbly I offer up our holier prayer!
I pray Thee, not in wrath
But in thy mercy, to confound
These men's devices! Lord,
Lighten their darkness with thy Gospel light,
And thus abate their pride,
Assuage their malice thus!

COLLOQUY X.

CROSTHWAITE CHURCH.—ST. KENTIGERN.

THOUGH the vale of Keswick owes little of its beauty to any work of man, the position of its Church is singularly fortunate. It stands alone*, about half a mile from the town, and somewhat farther from the foot of Skiddaw; and though not to be compared with the beautiful village churches of Lincolnshire and the West of England, there are few in these northern counties which equal it, and none perhaps in any part of the kingdom which forms a finer object from the surrounding country.

* Some of the oldest and finest yew trees in the country stood formerly in this churchyard. The vicar cut them down, thinking the wood might serve to make a pew for the singers, . . for which purpose it was found unserviceable, when too late. One of them grew beside the school house, and was so large, that an old man, more than fifty years ago, told my excellent friend, whose name I now write with regret as the late Sir George Beaumont, he had seen all the boys, some forty in number, perched at one time upon its boughs.

Scarcely a quarter of a mile distant there stood, some few years ago, a little grove of firs, the loss of which is one of the many injuries that the vale has suffered since I became one of its inhabitants. They stood by the road side just at an elbow of the river Greta, covering a mean and deserted building, which had formerly been a Quakers' Meeting House, and is now converted to the better purpose of a National School for girls. It is seldom that any common plantation adds a grace to the country, though to the ease with which it may deform it, some of these mountains bear lamentable witness; but these fir trees, planted as they were, merely because the nook of ground whereon they stood between the road and the river was not worth cultivating, could not have been more happily placed by the most judicious hand. From whatever side you looked over the landscape they were conspicuous; in summer by their darker hue, in winter by their only verdure. Standing about midway between the town and the church, they were a spot on which the eye rested, and many a sketch book will have preserved them as one of the features of the vale.

An injury of the same kind was committed some few years earlier, at the upper end of

Derwentwater, near Lodore. There was a birch grove there which covered a small piece of flat, worthless ground, and which had manifestly been planted by some one of gentle spirit, who feeling how greatly such a grove in that place would embellish one of the loveliest scenes in England, prepared for those who should come after him a pleasure which he could partake only in anticipation. No stranger who had any real perception of those beauties which so many strangers come here to behold, ever noticed that grove without an expression of delight. The trees were in their full growth, . . perhaps of fourscore years standing; the bark rent and rugged as that of the cork tree, at the lower part of their trunks, and silvery all above. They reached to the water's edge, in a little level bay which is overspread with water-lilies and reeds. From the lake you saw their light and graceful heads between you and the crags: on the shore they formed a grateful and refreshing shade in a sultry day, which I have frequently enjoyed, for the road lay through them. In the whole circuit of Derwentwater there was not a more beautiful spot than that bay while the grove was standing; and I believe no one who remembers what it was ever passes it now, without breathing something like a malediction upon those by whose orders it was felled. This was more vexatious than the destruction of the fir grove, because the pecuniary value of the trees could have been of no consequence to the absent proprietor, and if he had known their value as they stood, it may be believed, no consideration would have induced him to sacrifice them.

The Church was built in an age when durability was regarded as an important consideration in such structures. It is a large, unornamented, substantial edifice, with buttresses, battlements, and a square tower; and having stood for centuries, by God's blessing it may stand for centuries to come. On a nearer view, you perceive that it has suffered something by the substitution of slates for lead upon the roof, an alteration which was made some few years ago, when the building underwent a repair. Alice de Romley, heiress of Egremont and Skipton, who, in the reign of Stephen, or of his successor, married the Lord of Allerdale, gave it to Fountains Abbey, and is supposed to have been the person by whom it was founded and endowed. It was soon afterwards appropriated to that monastery, the collation being reserved to the Bishops of Carlisle. William Fitz Duncan, the husband of this Alice, was son to the Earl of Murray, and brother to David King of Scotland; and this may perhaps explain why the church was dedicated to the Scotch St. Kentigern, Bishop of Glasgow, and patron saint of that cathedral, a personage now utterly forgotten here, in the parish where, during so many generations, his festival used to be celebrated on the 13th of January. Here followeth his legend, . . it is a better word than history for such tales. Hagio-logists have related it without scruple, and during many ages it was believed without hesitation.

The Saint in question was, as the Romance says of Merlin, son of the Devil, a gentleman on his mother's side : his mother Thametes, or Thenis, being the daughter of King Lot of Lowthean and Orkenay, (a personage well known in the annals of the Round Table,) by Anna, daughter to Uther Pendragon, and half sister to King Arthur. A more illustrious stock could hardly be found in chivalrous genealogy. The time of his birth has been fixed in the year 514, and his nativity, ' admirable for the strangeness of it,' says Father Cressy, has been celebrated by many ancient writers. King Lot it seems was at that time a Pagan, and his Queen little better, for their daughter grew up in idolatry ; she had opportunity, however, of hearing frequent sermons, and, becoming a convert, observed the precepts of Christianity as diligently as if she had been baptized.

The young Princess was a person of singular beauty, and more singular devotion. Of all that she heard from her religious teacher, there was nothing which so strongly impressed her imagination as the maternity of the Blessed Virgin; insomuch that, (in the words* of the legend,) with a presumptuous boldness and a womanish temerity, she desired and longed to resemble her in this, and even made it the object of her prayers. After awhile she found unequivocal symptoms that her desire had been accomplished. How, or when, or by whom she had conceived, was what, according to her solemn and constant asseveration, she knew not. That it must have been by a man, John of Tynmouth, whom Cap-

Elapso demum temporis spatio inventa est illa in utero habens; et magnificans Deum, desiderium suum adimpletum esse simpliciter credebat. grave quotes, has not scrupled to affirm; but he says it is folly to inquire who ploughed and sowed the land, seeing that through God's blessing on the increase such excellent fruit was brought forth. Scandal, however, (for scandal there was even in the days of the Saints,) fixed upon Eugenius III., King of the Scots, for the father. But even scandal did not impeach* the sincerity of her declarations, which was proved beyond all doubt by the miracles that ensued.

There was a severe law among the Picts, that any damsel who was convicted of committing folly in her father's house, should be thrown from the summit of Duncpelder, one of the highest mountains in that country, and that the seducer should lose his head. To that summit Thametes was carried, protesting her innocence, and with prayers and tears, lifting up her hands to heaven for deliverance. Her protestations were in vain; not so her prayers: for by miraculous interpo-

* It is however impeached by the polemical and Jesuitical historian F. Alford, alias Griffith, who, when he says of Eugenius, that 'pater passim creditur,' adds, '*Notus etiam fæminarum genius, quæ magnis nominibus sua crimina solent dealbare. Quicquid sit, Kentigerni sanctitatem Deus multo miraculo illustravit, et rosas inter spinas nasci posse ostendit. sition, when she was thrown over the precipice, she descended upon the wings of the wind, like the Tuscan Virgin Clusia, or Pysche, in the most beautiful of classic fables, and alighted unhurt, having neither experienced fear nor danger in the descent. Your true Pagan in ecclesiastical Romance cares as little for miracles as Pantaloon in a Pantomime. King Lot and his people agreed that she had been saved from death by Christian enchantments; and at the command of this relentless father she was taken out several miles to sea, put into a leathern coracle, and set adrift. But the winds and waves were more merciful than man: He who rules them was her protector; in shorter time than the passage could have been performed by any art of navigation, she came to land at a place called Collenros or Culros*, and there, without human help, she brought forth a son.

A remarkable personage was at that time dwelling in a monastery at Collenros, Servan was his name: his mother Alpia was daughter to a king of Arabia, and Obeth his father was

* F. Alford (T. ii. p. 20) places this upon the Firth of Forth: 'hic habes Kentigerni natalem locum, ad Bodotriæ æstuarium, quod Laudoniam a Fifa dividit. Ibi Colenros olim, ubi fortè nunc Coldingham: quem locum Beda Coludi urbem, Ptolomæus Colaneam, vocavit in Laudoniæ regione.'

king of the land of Canaan. This holy Philistine was a Saint of approved prowess and great good nature ; had slain a dragon in single combat, turned water into wine, and once, when a hospitable poor man killed his only pig to entertain him and his religious companions, he supt upon the pork, and restored the pig to life next morning ; a palingenesia this which the eternal and unfortunate boar Serimner undergoes every day in Valhalla, and which the Saints of St. Servan's age, particularly the Scotch, British, and Irish Saints, frequently exhibited to the great profit and edification of their hosts. At the hour when Thametes was driven on shore, and safely delivered on the beach, this holy personage heard the song of angels rejoicing in the air, and thereby understood what had happened. So he hastened to the sea-side, and finding there the mother and the new-born babe, saluted the infant with these words ; ' Blessed art thou, my ' beloved, who comest in the name of the Lord ! ' Without delay he took them home to his convent, and baptized them both, naming the boy Kientiern, which is, being interpreted, Chief Lord, and which, by a slight alteration, has become Kentigern. But because the child as he grew up excelled his fellow-scholars in learning, docility, and all good qualities, St. Servan used to call him Mungo, being a term of endearment in what was then the language of that country ; and by this name he was afterwards more frequently invoked than by that which he received in baptism.

In the age to which this legend relates, and in that also in which it was written, monasteries were the only schools. The other boys, seeing that Kentigern was a favourite, hated him for that reason, and endeavoured by many malicious tricks to bring him into disgrace. St. Servan had a tame robin, who used to feed from his hand, perch upon his head or shoulder while he was reading or praying, and flutter its wings and sing as if bearing part in his devotions. The young villains one day twisted its head off, and accused Kentigern of having killed it. To prove his innocence, he made a cross upon the head and put it on again, and the bird was nothing the worse for what it had undergone. It was a rule in the monastery that every boy should take his turn for a week to attend the fires at night before they retired to rest, lest the nocturnal service should at any time be left unperformed for want of light. One night in Kentigern's week, after he had as usual duly performed this duty, the envious boys put out all the fires. At the proper hour he awoke, and perceiving what had been done, gathered a hazel bough, breathed upon it, set it on fire, and then lit the candles. One more attempt was made to bring shame upon him. The cook of the convent died and was buried; and the day after the burial the malicious scholars so far prevailed upon St. Servan that he ordered Kentigern upon his obedience to raise him from the dead; which, as so discrete a person consented to require it, seems to have been thought not an unreasonable exercise for one who was preparing to graduate as a Saint. The obedient cook came out of his grave at the call, and edified all the convent by an account of what he had seen in the other world.

Kentigern, however, who was now grown up, thought it time to depart from a place where his presence excited so many evil feelings; and knowing by revelation that this intention was conformable to the will of Providence, he stole away. The way which he took brought him to the river Mallena; a high tide had caused the stream to overflow, so that it would have been impassable, if that same Power who opened a way through the Red Sea for the Children of Israel had not made the waters retire to the right and left, and leave a dry path for him. Presently afterwards he crost a little salt-water inlet by a bridge; but no sooner was he over, than the waters flowed in in such abundance as to destroy that passage for evermore, and the Mal-lena was forced out of its own channel into that of the Ledon. Just as this change was effected St. Servan reached the bank in pursuit of the fugitive, and seeing him on the opposite side, he cried out, ' Oh my child, light of mine eyes, and ' staff of my old age, why hast thou forsaken me ! ' Remember how I took thee, even from thy ' mother's womb, and cherished thee, and in- ' structed thee, till this day ! Forsake not thou ' my grey hairs ! ' The young Saint wept at his words, and answered, ' My Father, thou seest ' that what I have done is God's will, which ' we cannot change, but must of necessity ' obey.' St. Servan then besought him to open a way again through the waters by his prayers, ' that I may come to thee,' he said, ' and become ' a son instead of a father, a disciple instead of ' a master, and attend upon thee as thy com- ' panion till the end of my life.' But Kentigern with many tears made answer, ' Return, I be- ' seech thee, O my Father ! instruct thy scholars ' by precept and example, and correct them by ' discipline. He by whom good actions are re- ' warded will requite thee for all the benefits ' which thou hast conferred upon me. Thou ' hast fought the good fight, and hast completed ‘thy course. I must go whither he hath sent me who hath set me apart for his service from my mother’s womb.’ So they mutually gave each other a blessing, and parted for ever in this world... They who can enter into the spirit of monastic romance, will feel that this situation is beautifully conceived.

The man of God proceeding on his appointed way, took up his abode at Glasgow, and there obtained such reputation for his learning and holiness of life, that in the twenty-fifth year of his age, upon the appointment of the king and clergy of Cumbria, he was consecrated to the episcopal office by an Irish Bishop, according to the usage of the British and Scottish Christians in those days. His diocese included the whole Cumbrian kingdom, which extended from the Roman Wall to the Firth of Forth, and from sea to sea; and his cathedral was in the city of Glasgow. Applying himself forthwith to his episcopal duties, we are told that he converted the unbaptized, brought back heretics and relapsed heathens to the faith, destroyed idols, built churches, and determined the boundaries of parishes, performing his visitations not on horseback, but afoot, after the manner of the apostles. His manner of life meantime was of the most hagi-heroical austerity. He wore a most rough cilice next his skin, and over it a garment of goat-skins, with a close hood or cowl, a white alb, and a stole. His crozier was neither finely wrought, nor ornamented with gold and jewels; a plain staff like a shepherd's crook contented him, and he had ever a manual in his hand, ready for his office. He slept always in a stone which was hollowed like a coffin, and with a stone for his pillow; and rising from a short sleep, used to immerse himself to the neck in cold water while he chanted the whole psalter. Throughout his whole life he abstained from meat and fermented liquor; and it was only every third or fourth day that he broke his fast, taking bread and milk, or butter, or cheese. During Lent he withdrew from all human society into the wilderness, and either lived upon wild roots, or by divine assistance fasted the whole forty days. On Good Friday he passed the night and day in frequent genuflexions, scourging his bare body; and on Easter Eve, till the very hour of the Resurrection, he remained hidden in a sepulchre, except during the celebration of divine service, and employed the whole time in the supererogatory good work of flagellating himself.

Such monastic virtues were of course rewarded with an abundant display of monastic miracles

Sometimes while he was officiating, a snow white dove, whose bill shone like burnished gold, was seen to settle upon his head. Frequently that head was veiled in the brightness of a cloud of glory, and sometimes his whole body was so glorified that it appeared like a pillar of fire, the effulgence whereof blinded the beholders. At other times when he was performing mass, the odour of his living sanctity was diffused through the church, healing various diseases, and filling all who were present with ineffable delight. During a season of scarcity he gave away the whole of his seed-corn to the poor, and sowed his fields with sand, nothing doubting but that God would provide a harvest; and in answer to his faith it proved a most luxuriant crop of the finest wheat. The better to eschew idleness he worked in the fields himself, and not having oxen for the plough, he called stags from the forest, who came in obedience, and bowed their necks to the yoke. After the day's work was done they returned to their lair, and came again duly when their services were wanted. A wolf one day took the liberty of eating one of the team. When St. Kentigern heard of this misdeed, he stretched out his hand towards the forest, and commanded the culprit to appear before him forthwith, and make satisfaction for his offence.

The Wolf immediately came running, and howling piteously in fear. The Saint, however, more merciful than Isgrim expected, only condemned him to take the stag's place in the team, and perform his share of work for that season: accordingly the wolf was yoked with the remaining stags, and having ploughed nine good acres (Scotch measure) was discharged.

This silly legend occurs more than once in the Acts of the Saints, but here in the life of St. Kentigern it may be forgiven, for the sake of a beautiful passage which accompanies it. Many persons coming to witness and admire the extraordinary sight of a wolf yoked with stags and drawing a plough, the Saint said unto them, ' Men and brethren, why marvel ye? ' Before man became disobedient to his Maker, ' not animals alone, but even the elements themselves obeyed him. Now, alas, because of his ' prevarication, all things are changed. The lion ' rends him, the wolf devours, the serpent bites; ' water drowns, fire burns, air infects, earth itself, as if it were made iron, oftentimes destroys him by famine; and as the height and ' consummation of all evil, man not only rages ' against man, but, by committing sin, becomes ' his own worst enemy. But inasmuch as many ‘ holy men are found perfect before the Lord in ‘ innocence, and pure obedience, in holiness, in

‘ the love of God, in faith and in justice, they as ‘ it were recover the ancient right of natural do‘ minion, having authority over creatures, and ‘ elements, and diseases and death.’

It happened once that St. Kentigern, having distributed in alms the whole of his stores, was in want of provisions for his own monastery, and applied for assistance to Morken, or Mark, the king of that petty kingdom. This personage appears not to have been the same sovereign by whom the Saint was invited to his episcopal office; for supposing that if the Bishop could work miracles he had no occasion for any human succour, and jesting irreverently upon that supposition, he bade him cast his cares upon the Lord and look to him for support: for thus he exhorted others to do, and it became him now to put his own lessons in practice. ‘ Thou fearest God,’ said the profane Prince, ‘ and keepest his commandments, yet thou art destitute of all good things, and even in want of necessary food: whereas I, . . . who neither seek the kingdom of God nor his righteousness, . . . I am in prosperity and plenty. Thy faith therefore is plainly fallacious, and that which thou preachest is proved to be false.’ Kentigern reasoned with him, but to no effect, and Morken broke off the conversation by pointing to his granaries, and telling him in mockery he was welcome to all that they contained, provided he could remove it to his own dwelling-place by faith alone, without human assistance. The Saint took him at his word, and lifting up his hands, called upon the Lord in prayer. Behold, the Clyde which was then flowing quietly beside them, rose suddenly and overflowed its banks, spread round the granaries, floated them from their foundations, bore them down the stream, and deposited them at the Saint's abode at Mollingdenar, the granaries being nothing the worse for the removal, and not a grain of the corn wet. It must have been a grand sight to have seen them shoot the falls!

So far was this great miracle from producing any good effect upon the incorrigible King Morken, that it only made the Saint an object of his hatred, and one day he kicked him with such violence that the blow brought him to the ground. Saints were not persons to be injured with impunity; the offending foot swelled, and the tumour became so painful, that in no long time it produced death. Kentigern found his own life in danger from the kinsmen of the deceased, and withdrawing from Cumbria, travelled toward Menevia, where St. David was then flourishing in the full blossom of holiness. On the way he converted many Pagans at Caer Leon, and built a church there; . . . whether Chester, or Caer Leon upon the Usk, be meant, has not been determined, both places lying in his way. After he had sojourned some time with the great Saint of Wales, Cadwallon, King of that country, gave him ground whereon to erect a monastery, at a place called Elgy, or Elwy, where he established an episcopal see, and raised such a community as never existed but in the golden days of monachism. He had nine hundred and sixty-five brethren there under his absolute authority; three hundred of these were uneducated men, whose office it was to till the lands and tend the cattle belonging to the convent; three hundred more of the same description were employed within the building in preparing food and other domestic concerns; the remaining three hundred and sixty-five were literates, whose business it was to perform divine service. They were divided into companies or watches; when one set had finished their service, another was ready immediately to begin, so that an everlasting course of prayer and thanksgiving was kept up without intermission night and day. Laus perpetua this everlasting service is called; and the perfection of monastic life, as far as relates to worship, can be carried no farther.

Here it happened one night that, having, according to his custom, recited the whole psalter while up to his neck in cold water, he felt thoroughly chilled, and requested a favourite disciple to bring him some fire. The youth ran to the hearth, and not finding a chafing-dish, nor anything to answer the same purpose, at hand, took the hot coals in the skirts of his habit, and carried them safely to his master by virtue of faith. This was the disciple who succeeded him in that see, and left it his own name of St. Asaph. During his abode here Kentigern saw the soul of St. David escorted by a multitude of angels to the gate of Paradise, at which our Saviour himself met and welcomed him!

Kentigern went seven times from Elwy to Rome, where his consecration was confirmed by Pope Gregory, the spiritual Apostle of the Anglo-Saxons; that pontiff, it is added, acknowledging that Kentigern had been called to the episcopal office by the Providence of God, but nevertheless being* hardly persuaded to supply the informalities of the ceremony. At length Rederech, a new king of Cumbria, who had been baptized in Ireland by the disciples of St. Patrick, and who hoped, by restoring Christianity in his kingdom, to remove the famine and other calamities with which it had been visited because of the apostacy of the people, invited him back to Glasgow. Accordingly the Saint returned, leaving St. Asaph to succeed him in Wales, and taking with him six hundred and sixty of his monks. King Rederech came out to meet him, with a great multitude of people, and with more in company than either he or the people were aware of. Kentigern, however, knew who were present; and having given his blessing to the king and his countrymen, he raised his voice, and in the name of the Lord commanded all those who envied the salvation of men, and resisted God's word, to depart forthwith, that they might be no hindrance to them who should believe. Instantly, in the sight of all, an innumerable multitude of wicked Spirits, horrible to behold both for their stature and shape, fled away from the company. The Saint failed not to take advantage of the awe which this miracle excited, telling the people they had now with their own eyes seen what the Spirits were by whom they were seduced to adore dumb Idols, or the senseless Elements, which were creatures appointed by God for their use and service. Woden himself, he said, had been but a mortal man, whose body was reduced to dust, and whose soul was now lying in hell fire, there to be tormented for ever. He then proceeded to instruct the willing and believing multitude; and while he was preaching, the ground whereon he stood marvellously elevated itself under him, and formed a high hillock in the midst of a plain field called Holdelin.

All things now succeeded to his heart's content. The people believed, the earth yielded its fruits, the kingdom prospered; the Queen, who had long been barren, brought forth a son, by virtue of his prayers, and that son lived to excel all his predecessors in holiness and in temporal prosperity. St. Kentigern converted the Picts of Galloway, and the country of Albania, and sent missionaries to the Orkneys, Norway, and Iceland. Wherever he went the blind received sight, and the dumb spake, and the ears of the deaf were opened; the lame recovered the use of their limbs, and the paralytic their strength ; lepers were healed, and devils were cast out. There was healing in the crumbs which fell from his hand, and in the drops from his cup, and in the touch of his garments ; yea, the sick who came within the shadow of his body were restored to health. Rain and hail and snow, (not to mention a Scotch mist,) however heavily they were falling all around, never touched him or any part of his apparel, feeling as strong a power of repulsion in his sanctity, as in the curse of Kehama, and that power even acted as an umbrella for all his disciples who accompanied him.

Austere and perfect as St. Kentigern was, he was indulgent to human frailty. Queen Langueth, the wife of Rederech, was unfaithful to her husband's bed, and, in the blindness of her adulterous passion, gave her paramour a ring which the King had entrusted to her keeping, and which he was indiscreet enough to wear publicly. Rederech, being informed of this, took the noble out hunting, and retired with him apart after the heat of the chase, to the banks of the Clyde, where the adulterer, unsuspecting of danger, fell asleep in the shade. The King then saw the fatal ring upon his finger, and upon this full proof of guilt, hardly could refrain from killing him upon the spot. He contented himself, however, for the present, with drawing the ring gently off, threw it into the river, and on his return to the palace called sternly upon the Queen to produce it. She sent for it secretly with all speed to her paramour; and when it was not forthcoming, all that the intercession of the nobles could obtain for her was only a respite of three days before she should be put to death. The miserable Queen, who saw that there was no other hope of deliverance, dispatched a trusty messenger to Kentigern, confessing her guilt, and entreating him to provide a way for her escape. There was no occasion for this messenger to deliver his errand; it had already been revealed to the Saint, and that holy man bade him go to the Clyde, throw a hook and line in the water, and bring him the first fish which he should catch. A salmon was presently taken, from whose inside he took the ring, and sent it to the poor penitent adulteress, who produced it to the King triumphantly, as a miraculous proof of her innocence. Astonished at such a miracle, Rederech denounced the severest vengeance upon the unfortunate informers, and on his knees entreated the Queen's pardon. Langueth kept her own secret with due prudence; but she had grace enough to desire that no one might suffer on her account, and to make it the condition of her forgiving the King, that he should forgive her accusers. The sin-score was settled with St. Kentigern in the regular way, and from that time she amended her life.

The Saints of that age (which was the golden age of Saints) were upon as friendly terms with each other as the emperors and kings of this. St. Columba came from Iona with a great retinue of disciples to visit St. Kentigern, and St. Kentigern with such another suite went out to receive him. Each divided his train into three companies, according to age; the juniors led the way, those of mature years followed, and grey-haired venerable men closed the procession. St. Kentigern's company chanted as they went 'In the ways of the Lord great is the glory of the Lord,' and 'The way of the righteous is made straight:' St. Columba's, 'The Saints shall go on from virtue to virtue; their God shall be seen in Sion; Hallelujah!' Before they met* Columba declared to his companions that he saw a fiery column descend upon Kentigern's head, and condense thereon in the form of a crown of gold. They embraced and kissed each other; and when they parted they exchanged their pastoral staves. That which Columba gave was long preserved as a relic in the Church of St. Wilfred at Ripon.

St. Kentigern performed a good-natured miracle at this meeting. Some of St. Columba's attendants could not resist their old propensity for sheep-stealing, when a favourable opportunity occurred for indulging it in the Lowlands. They beat Kentigern's shepherd, and carried off a ram; but no sooner had they cut off the ram's head, in hungry anticipation, no doubt, of the broth and the burnt wool, than it was converted into stone; and, what was more terrible, stuck to the hands of the man who held it, so that he could by no means rid himself of the portentous appendage. The headless body ran back to the flock, doing apparently as well without a head, as many persons appear to do with an empty one. This poor body had reason to complain of the catastrophe; for upon the confession of the thieves and the contrition which they professed, St. Kentigern not only relieved the one offender from the stone head, (which, says the legend, is preserved to this day, in the same place, a proof of the miracle,) but presented the party with the living, though headless carcass. Two other notable miracles he performed in his latter days.

He made a cross of sea-sand without the admixture of any other material; it was compact, solid, and durable, and many persons who came to visit it in devotion, were healed of many diseases by its virtue. And he erected a mill upon the Clyde which would neither work on a Sunday, nor grind any stolen corn.

The Saint lived and flourished in miracles till he attained the prodigious age of an hundred and eighty-five. The Bollandists candidly admit that there may be reason to doubt this part of his history, and Father Cressy, the Camelgulper, (following, as usual, his guide Father Alford,) lopt off the hundred, in conformity, he says, to the true computation of Bishop Ushher. Yet methinks this longevity might be admitted without hesitation by all who believe the beginning of the legend, or the end, or any of the intermediate adventures. And indeed the close of the legend requires that it should be admitted, for it states that, in consequence of the extreme relaxation produced by this extreme old age, it was necessary to support his under jaw with a chin-stay. At length he perceived that the hour of his departure was nigh, and called together his disciples to give them his last benediction. But the death of St. Kentigern was to be not less portentous in all its circumstances than his birth. One of the disciples, in the name of all his brethren, interrupted the valediction, and said, ‘ Father and master, we know ‘ that it is thy desire to be dissolved, and to be

‘ with Christ ; nevertheless, we beseech thee,
‘ have mercy upon us who are thy children in
‘ the Lord ! When at any time we have through ‘ human frailty erred and gone astray, we have ‘ confessed our fault in thy sight, and endeavoured to amend it according to thy directions.
‘ Ask therefore now for us of the Lord, that we ‘ may be permitted to leave this vale of tears
‘ with thee, and enter with thee into his joy ; for
‘ of a truth we believe that whatsoever thou shalt
‘ ask, the Lord will grant. And it seemeth to us
‘ not fitting that a prelate without his clergy,
‘ a pastor without any of his flock, a father without his children, should enter into the joy of
‘ his Lord.’

This proof of their affection moved the departing Saint, and collecting breath as he could, he replied, ‘ The will of God be done with you
‘ and with me, and let Him dispose of us as to ‘ Him seems best.’ This was all that he expressed in words, but inwardly and in spirit he prayed that their desire might be granted. Behold an Angel appeared, and said, ‘ Kentigern, ‘ elect and beloved of God, rejoice thou and be ‘glad, for the desire of thy heart is heard, and it ‘shall be done to thy disciples according to thy ‘prayer. To-morrow ye shall go out from the ‘body of this death into everlasting life, and the ‘Lord will be with you, and ye with him, for ‘evermore. And forasmuch as thine whole life in ‘this world hath been a continued martyrdom, it ‘hath pleased the Lord that thou shouldst have ‘a gentler dissolution than other men. Give ‘order therefore that a warm bath be made ‘ready to-morrow, and go thou into it; and ‘there, without pain, thou shalt render up thy ‘spirit into the hands of the Lord in peace.

‘Let thy brethren enter afterwards, and they ‘also, being delivered from the bonds of death, ‘shall ascend with thee, in the splendour of ‘holiness, to the kingdom of Heaven.’

Accordingly, so it was done. The bath was made ready, and the Saint, being placed in it, lifted up his hands and eyes to heaven, then bowed his head, and fell asleep in the Lord. As soon as his body was removed, one of the brethren entered to take his place, and expired there in like manner; and thus one after the other, all in turn, went into the bath, before the water was cold, and died there; and all in company with their spiritual father ascended to the celestial abodes.

When our Kalendar was purged at the Reformation, directions were given that respect should be had to Saints of the blood-royal. This must have been the chief reason why St. Kentigern's name was inserted (though not indeed in red letters) in the Kalendar, prefixed to that liturgy which gave occasion for the Scotch covenant, and fired the train of rebellion that had been laid through both kingdoms. Perhaps another motive was, that as his other name, Mungo, had become not uncommon in Scotland, his memory, owing to that circumstance, might still have been popular. Yet we may reasonably wonder that any motives should have prevailed for its insertion, seeing how entirely fabulous the legend is in all its parts.

PART II.

THE REFORMATION.—DISSENTERS.—METHODISTS.

I WAS walking alone in Howray, looking upon the Church and upon Skiddaw behind it, which was then in all the glory of a midsummer sunset. Sir Thomas approached, and laid his hand upon my shoulder; I started, not at his appearance, (for I had seen him coming,) but because I felt the touch. What, said he, with a smile, did you suppose that I could not make myself sensible to tact as well as sight, and assume corporeality as easily as form? . . . But tell me, where were your thoughts when I recalled them?

MONTESINOS.

Where I shall soon be myself, Sir Thomas, . . . with those that are departed. The weight of time and of eternity was on my spirit. I was contemplating that Church and yonder mountain. Seven centuries have gone by since the Church was founded, and there Skiddaw has stood since the foundation of the hills was laid.

My years will be presently like a tale that is told. These will remain; the one unchangeable, the other I trust never to be changed in its destination and uses, whatever renovations the structure may require.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Is there anything mournful in that thought to a religious mind?

MONTESINOS.

The thought is solemn rather than mournful. It is only our mortal duration that we measure by visible and mensurable objects; and there is nothing mournful in the contemplation for one who knows that the Creator made him to be the image of his own eternity, and who feels that in the desire for immortality he has sure proof of his capacity for it... I had been also thinking of the change in human institutions; a thought naturally connected with any permanent monuments whether of art or nature. The shadows glide over that mountain, and the clouds collect there, and the sun glorifies it, as they did when the Druids performed their rites within yonder circle of stones, when the Romans and Romanized Britons erected altars to Jupiter and Belatucadrus, and when the Danes offered up victims to Thor and Woden. The Church, too, has undergone its changes.

The Rood-loft has disappeared, . . not a bell rings on St. Kentigern's Day, . . and not a trace of the Saint remains in his own parish.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Do you hold that part of the change for good or for evil?

MONTESINOS.

Touching the Rood-loft, I know not that the Calvaries in Catholic countries lead to any superstition at this time. Formerly there were foul abuses connected with such representations, and it was the detection of some such that induced Elizabeth reluctantly to give up her intention of having the Crucifix retained in our Churches, as it is in the Lutheran. Upon that point, I confess, I should have held rather with the Queen than with Archbishop Parker. But for the Saint, it was quite necessary that the Romish Demi-gods should be sent packing after their Heathen predecessors, the legends of the one being every whit as fabulous as those of the other. Yet I wish it had been deemed advisable to have winnowed the Kalendar, and left in it every name which is entitled to respect and gratitude.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And why might not this have been done?

MONTESINOS.

Because the whole system of Romish hagiology is inseparably connected with fraud and falsehood. I abhor it the more for what we have lost in consequence of its audacious and impious profligacy. Festivals, when duly observed, attach men to the civil and religious institutions of their country; it is an evil, therefore, when they fall into disuse. For the same reason the loss of local observances is to be regretted: . . . who is there that does not remember their effect upon himself in early life? St. Kentigern could not have been allowed to retain his honours, for there is no compromising with a system of impudent and villainous imposture. But I wish the name of some holy man, whether canonized or not, whose history would bear inquiry, and whose example might serve for edification, had been substituted in his stead.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Why not your more fortunate St. Herbert, who has left his name to the island which he inhabited?

MONTESINOS.

He, too, had his yearly festival here in Romish times: on the 13th of April the Vicar of Crosthwaite used to perform mass in his chapel on the island, to the joint honour of the Hermit and St. Cuthbert, for they had been friends while they lived, and after death their memories were not divided. Forty days' indulgence was granted to every one who devoutly attended. What a happy holyday must that have been for all these vales; and how joyous on a fine spring day must the lake have appeared with boats and banners from every chapelry, . . and how must the chapel have adorned that little isle, giving a human and religious character to the solitude! Its ruins are still there, in such a state of total dilapidation that they only make the island, mere wilderness as it has now become, more melancholy. But St. Herbert, I think, could not hold a place in a reformed kalendar; the little that is related of him belongs to a legend grievously disfigured with fiction. Nor indeed do I think that merely to have been a hermit should entitle any one to respectful commemoration.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Hermits, as well as Monks, Montesinos, have been useful in their day. Your state of society is not the better because it provides no places of religious retirement for those who desire and need it.

MONTESINOS.

Certainly not. I consider the dissolution of the Religious Houses as the greatest evil that accompanied the Reformation.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Take from such communities their irrevocable vows, their onerous laws, their ascetic practices ; cast away their mythology, and with it the frauds and follies connected therewith, and how beneficial would they then be found ! What opportunities would they afford to literature, what aid to devotion, what refuge to affliction, what consolation to humanity !

MONTESINOS.

And what relief to society, which, as it becomes more crowded in all its walks, and as education and intelligence are more and more diffused, must in every succeeding generation feel more pressingly the want of such institutions ! Considering the condition of single women in the middle classes, it is not speaking too strongly to assert, that the establishment of Protestant nunneries, upon a wise plan and liberal scale, would be the greatest benefit that could possibly be conferred upon these kingdoms. The name, indeed, is deservedly obnoxious ; for nunneries, such as they exist in Roman Catholic countries, and such as at this time are being re-established in this, are connected with the worst corruptions of popery, being at once nurseries of superstition and of misery. In their least objectionable point of view they serve as Bedlams, with this difference, that they are not intended for the cure, but for the promotion of religious madness. But they serve, also, as Penitentiaries, in which bigoted or hard-hearted and ambitious parents condemn their daughters to imprisonment for life. This dreadful abuse is so notorious, that such institutions would not be tolerated even in superstitions countries, unless some weighty advantages were found in them, whereof the great body of the people are sensible. And how easily might those advantages be obtained in communities founded upon the principles of our own Church, and liable to no such evils !

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The Reformation itself has rendered them more necessary, by relieving the clergy from their obligation to a single life.

MONTESINOS.

Sir Thomas, I can account for anything in your controversial writings, except for the sort of temper which manifests itself whenever you touch upon that point.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

O Montesinos ! what errors are there which may not be explained by the frailty and the sinfulness of poor human nature? They who are under the direction of an erring conscience may, in a certain sense, properly be said to be possessed: wonder not, therefore, that the same possession which divested me of my natural humanity, should, in this other and more excusable point, have corrupted my judgment also! The angry feeling which I betrayed upon that subject had its rise partly in personal considerations. My early bent had been toward the ecclesiastical profession, and I was deterred from pursuing it only by the obligation of celibacy which* it would have imposed. But looking always upon it as a holier way of life, and perhaps thinking sometimes that in certain respects it might have proved a happier one, some dissatisfaction with myself was naturally felt when the subject of clerical celibacy was forced upon my attention. ‘ Our most unreasonable prejudices are generally the strongest*.’ I was not willing to admit that those persons who protested against this obligation, as being contrary both to the letter and spirit of the Scriptures, had perceived a plain and manifest truth, . . one, too, of great importance to society, . . where I had been blind; and I fell into the common fault (not the less reprehensible for being common) of imputing the worst motives to those from whom I differed in opinion. We carry our habits of mind with us from this world into the next, be they good or evil, and such as they are is the lot which they have prepared for us; but our errors are mortal, and for them there is no resurrection. Luther and I are friends and associates now, and Frith and Bainham have forgiven me. . . I offer no excuse for the means which I employed against the Reformers, farther than that, in that unhappy and unchristian course of conduct, I was acting in the spirit of the age. Be you thankful that your lot has fallen in times when, though there may be many evil tongues and exasperated spirits, there are none who have fire and faggot at command ! But it should be remembered that the Reformation had its dark side, and with that side it presented itself to my view. I grieved over a spoliation which cannot even now be called to mind without regret ; I resisted opinions which in their sure consequences led to anarchy in all things, tending not only to overthrow the foundations of authority both in church and state, and thus to the destruction of all government and all order, but to subvert the moral law, and dethrone conscience from its seat in the heart of man. The evil which I apprehended came to pass. That I did not with the same perspicuity foresee the eventual good, was because it was less certain, and more remote.

MONTESINOS.

Perhaps, also, because you regarded the natural and probable course of human affairs, without sufficiently considering the ways of Providence.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

My friend, let no man presume that he can see prospectively into the ways of Providence ! His part is to contemplate them in the past, and trust in them for the future ; but, so trusting, to act always upon motives of human prudence, directed by religious principles. I beheld a system of profligate robbery, a transfer of property from religious establishments to knaves and courtiers, in which Gardiner and Bonner, afterwards the most inhuman agents of a bloody reign, acquiesced; I knew what convulsions Muncer had excited, and we had seen also in that age the consequences of fanaticism carried to their full extent by the Anabaptists. Are you quite safe from a repetition of either evil? Time passes on, and the fashions of the mind, as well as of the body, change; but the mind and the body remain the same in all ages, and are subject to the same accidents of disease and error.

MONTESINOS.

This I have learnt from history; and the earth itself affords an emblem of it. Let a deep trench be opened in the cleanest field or the most highly cultivated garden, and when the mould that is thrown out shall have lain long enough to be clothed with vegetation, it will be covered with the same plants which overran the surface before it had ever been disturbed by the spade or by the plough. The system of spoliation we have seen renewed in these days, as the first effect of the French Revolution wherever it extended. We have seen, also, in the triumph of democratical fanaticism, a counterpart of the Munster Tragedy, Marat and Hebert and Robespierre being the Johns of Leyden and the Knipperdollins of democracy. Most persons can discover religious madness, and are, generally, too ready to suspect it; but few are aware that political insanity is in these days even more common and more contagious.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

From which have you most to apprehend?... for both diseases are rife among you at this time!

MONTESINOS.

I think, from the political plague. America is in more danger from religious fanaticism. The government there not thinking it necessary to provide religious instruction for the people in any of the new states, the prevalence of superstition, and that, perhaps, in some wild and terrible shape, may be looked for as one likely consequence of this great and portentous omission. An Old Man of the Mountain might find dupes and followers as readily as the All-friend Jemima; and the next Aaron Burr who seeks to carve a kingdom for himself out of the overgrown territories of the Union, may discover that fanaticism is the most effective weapon with which ambition can arm itself; that the way for both is prepared by that immorality which the want of religion naturally and necessarily induces, and that Camp Meetings may be very well directed to forward the designs of a Military Prophet. Were there another Mahommed to arise, there is no part of the world where he would find more scope, or fairer opportunity, than in that part of the Anglo-American Union into which the elder states continually discharge the restless part of their population, leaving Laws and Gospel to overtake it if they can, for in the march of modern colonization both are left behind. But in these kingdoms fanaticism, though it abound among us, and is continually showing itself, and seeking to enlarge its border, is kept down by the influence of civilization, and finds everywhere something to controul or to correct it. If a breach be made in our sanctuary, it will be by the combined forces of Popery, Dissent, and Unbelief, fighting under a political flag.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

We have spoken of the Roman-Catholics. They have an assignable and obvious motive, seeking the overthrow of your Church as the first and great step toward the re-establishment of their own. But what can the Dissenters propose to themselves that they should join in this unholy alliance?

MONTESINOS.

The better part of the Dissenters, those, I mean, who are more influenced by a religious than by a sectarian feeling, keep aloof from it. But the principle of non-conformity in religion is very generally connected with political discontent; the old leaven is still in the mass, and, whenever there is thunder in the atmosphere, it begins to work. In the time of the American war they were wholly with the Americans; and, during that of the French Revolution, their wishes were not with the government, nor their voice with the voice of the country. At contested elections their weight is uniformly thrown into the opposition scale; at times, when an expression of public opinion is called for, their exertions are always on the factious side. They are what Swift called them, schismatics in temporals as well as spirituals. The truth is that, as Burleigh said of the English Papists, they are but half Englishmen at heart; for they acknowledge only one part of the two-fold Constitution under which they live, and, consequently, sit loose in their attachment to the other. Of the two strands of the cable one has been cut through. Yet it is pretended that the existence of the Dissenting interest, as it is called, is advantageous to the nation; and this paradox has been so often, and so confidently advanced, that it is now one of those received fallacies by which the people are deluded.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

There is no evil from which Providence may not educe some good; and yet the evil is not, for that reason, the less to be deprecated. Upon what grounds is this paradox maintained? I should think it not more preposterous to assert that a wen, or an encysted tumour, was an agreeable and useful part of the body which it diseased and deformed.

MONTESINOS.

It is argued that they have kept alive a more influential spirit of religion in these kingdoms than would otherwise have been preserved; that in this respect they have acted upon the clergy of the Church of England, as Protestantism itself is known to have affected the Church of Rome; and that hereby they have prevented the Establishment from sinking into that state of torpid indifference, and general inactivity, to which, the persons who advance this opinion affirm, religious establishments have an inherent and constant tendency. And therefore, they say, the clergy are at this time, as a body, more learned, more decorous, and more zealous than they would have been, if there had been no in-vidious eyes upon their conduct, and no jealousy or emulation to stimulate them to their proper duty.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The division between Papist and Protestant would have sufficed for this, even if the representation were true, to the full extent, in all its parts.

MONTESINOS.

Moreover, it is said, that had it not been for the dissenting ministers, a considerable portion of the people would have been left without any religious instruction.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In that point there had been a great sin of omission in the government, a sin which is chargeable also, in no slight degree, upon the heads of the clergy. It is not more directly the duty of a government to provide for the defence and safety of the commonwealth, than it is to provide religious instruction for the people : and, whenever the population had outgrown the means provided, then it ought to have been the business, as it was the duty, of the heads of the clergy, to have laid before the government a representation of the deficiency which appeared, and the necessity of remedying it. So far, therefore, as the dissenting ministers supplied the want of other religious instructors, and, so supplying it, delayed the only regular and convenient remedy, evil was done by the very prevention of good; and there was this farther evil, that the teachers, who thus found room and opportunity to interlope, inculcated a feeling of enmity toward one branch of the constitution. Now nothing is more certain than that religion is the basis* upon which civil government rests, . . . that from religion power derives its authority, laws their efficacy, and both their seal and sanction. And it is necessary that this religion be established for the security of the state, and for the welfare of the people, who would, otherwise, be moved to and fro with every wind of doctrine. A state is secure in proportion as the people are attached to its institutions; it is therefore the first, and plainest rule of sound polity, that the people be trained up in the way they should go:

* The reader, who may wish to see this proved upon political and constitutional grounds, is referred to Mr. Kendall's Letters on the State of Ireland, the Roman-Catholic Question, and the Merits of Constitutional Religious Distinctions (pp. 798, 810, 987); a work of great ability. The subject has been treated in a religious view by Philip Skelton in his Deism Revealed. (Vol. i. pp. 49. 51, second edit.) Let me take this opportunity of observing, that Skelton's book might very usefully be included among the publications of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge.

the state that neglects this prepares its own destruction; and they who train them in any other way are undermining it. Nothing in abstract science can be more certain than these positions are.

MONTESINOS.

All of which are, nevertheless, denied by our professors of the arts babblative and scribbulative; some in the audacity of evil designs, and others in the glorious assurance of impenetrable ignorance.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The evil which your schismatics have occasioned is not confined to their own country: they have prevented the extension of the Protestant faith.

MONTESINOS.

Mr. Butler has observed, with a Roman-Catholic's feeling, that the Protestant religion would not at this day have been established in any part of Germany, had it not been for the protection afforded it by the kings of France*. It may with better foundation be said, that the Protestant cause sustained more serious injury

* 'It may truly be said, that if there be a Protestant state 'from the Vistula to the Rhine, or a Mahometan state between 'the Danube and the Mediterranean, its existence is owing to 'the Bourbon monarchs.'—Germanic Empire, p. 133.

from the English Puritans, than from all the efforts of Spain and Austria combined, and of France also, when France put forth its strength against it. The tyranny which they exercised during their opprobrious reign, and the anarchy by which, as a necessary consequence, it was succeeded, were alike injurious to religion. Never in any other age did so many persons fall off to Popery on the one hand, and to Infidelity on the other; and these evil seeds, having had time and room to grow and spread, continued to flourish after the Church of England was re-established. For the Church never perfectly recovered its proper power; the roots of its authority had been shaken; and its discipline, having been long suspended, could not be re-established without exciting greater difficulties than there was any disposition to encounter; so it fell at length into disuse.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Men become infidels easily, if they have never truly been believers, . . if they have been imperfectly grounded in religion, or brought up in one of its corrupted forms, against which the reasonable heart of man revolts. Presumption and vanity, acting upon ignorance, betray many into this sin, according to the proverb which saith, ‘ the ignorant hath an eagle’s wings and

‘an owl’s eyes.’ Some are led astray by unfavourable circumstances, of ill teaching, ill example, or neglect, and thus, even where there is not an evil heart of unbelief, find themselves wandering like sheep without a shepherd. The press has long been actively employed, and never so actively as now, in undermining the foundations of faith, and effacing all respect for religious institutions, and for religion itself. And in men thus prepared, the propagandist of Atheism and the Jesuit both find facile converts, according to the course of the times, .. and the age or constitution of the subject. Indeed, the transition between Popery and Infidelity is in either direction short and easy, and therefore it is frequently made. A man proposes to himself the false dilemma, that, in matters of religion, he must either submit absolutely to authority, or reject it altogether; and he chooses one or the other alternative according to his temper. Many a man takes the one part in youth and health, the other in age and sickness; and, having lived without God in the world, dies with a discharge in full from the Priest, as a clear acquittance from all responsibility; and with a candle in his hand, to show him the way in the dark! These are changes in which the rise and progress of error are plainly to be traced: the motives are tangible; Infidelity gives a license in this world for the gratification of all desires and propensities, however sinful, and the Priest grants a pardon under the Great Seal of Rome, which is to be valid in the next. This is just as intelligible now as it was in the age of Leo X. But how is it that your Dissenters increase in number, when no new grounds for dissent have arisen, and they themselves have long been ashamed of those fanatical objections to the Established Church, which were the original grounds of their separation?

MONTESINOS.

Their ministers wear the cassock; none of them, except a handful of Unitarians, would now advance any serious objections against the Liturgy, which was such an abomination to their predecessors; and perhaps there is not one among them who would think it necessary to keep Christmas-day as a fast, or deem it idolatrous to bow at the name of his Redeemer. We must find the solution of your question in temporal considerations, not in the perversities, freaks and infirmities of crooked, crazy, and queasy consciences.

Any degree of intolerance short of that full extent which the Papal Church exercises where it has the power, acts upon the opinions which it is intended to suppress like pruning upon vigorous plants ; they grow the stronger for it. By this sort of intolerance the Dissenters were vexed and strengthened from the time of the Restoration till the Revolution. There ensued an interval then during which the Dissenters went with the Government in their political wishes and feelings. This continued, with the exception of the few latter years of Queen Anne's reign, from the time when the Toleration Act was passed, to the commencement of the troubles in America ; during that interval the asperity of sectarian feeling was mitigated, and the Dissenters can scarcely be said to have existed as a party in the state. They consisted of the Quakers, who stood as much aloof from the other sects as from the Church, and of the Three Denominations, as the Presbyterians, the Independents, and the Baptists, called themselves collectively ; .. and these were more engaged in controversy among themselves than with the Establishment. The Baptists split into two bodies, calling themselves General and Particular, that is to say, the one allowed of latitudinarian, the other professed Calvinistic opinions. The Presbyterians, whose sect had been the most numerous, lapsed into Arianism first, then into Socinianism, till few of the original description were left. The Independents underwent no change ; and all, in the natural course of things, gave more proselytes to the Church than they drew from it.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

You have spoken of that period as, on the whole, the happiest in English history, having been least disquieted by political and religious troubles.

MONTESINOS.

But, as I then observed, it was a time of great degeneracy in very many important points. The manners of high life were not indeed so absolutely profligate as in the infamous days of Charles II., but there was a greater degree of general coarseness. Drunkenness had become as much a national vice among the gentry, as it was among the Germans. The learning which the universities imparted was still sound and orthodox, . . but there was little of it ; and, considering them as schools of morals, the course of life there was better adapted to graduate young men in the brutalizing habits of the society wherewith they were soon to mingle, than to qualify them for reforming it. The Church, therefore, was ill supplied with ministers ; its higher preferments were bestowed with more reference to political connexions than to individual desert; and there never was less religious feeling, either within the Establishment or without, than when Wesley blew his trumpet and awakened those who slept. His followers soon divided upon the old question of fatalism; . . . a considerable number of the Calvinistic branch, having no leader after Whitefield's death, and no such constitution to keep them together as Wesley had framed for the subjects of his spiritual dominion, joined one or other body of the old Dissenters, and most frequently the Independents, to whom they brought a great accession of zeal and strength. Methodism, even under Wesley, had weaned them from the Church, and Whitefield had always been more in sympathy with the Puritans, than with the Establishment in which he was ordained. The orthodox Dissenters were thus recruited, not by any exertions of their own, but by gathering in those whom the Methodists had drawn away from the Church, and had not been able to retain. And in this manner they are continually recruited at this time.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But when converts were made in populous parts of the land, such as large towns and manufacturing districts, where the greater number must always be found, they would be, not members won over from the Church, but sheep whom the pastors had never folded, . . stragglers gathered in from the waste : the overflow of the people, for whose increase no moral and religious provision had been made by a supine and timid hierarchy and a reckless government.

MONTESINOS.

Persons of that description, and they are still, to the reproach of government, very numerous, are of the lowest class ; and that class continues with the Methodists, for a cause which I will presently explain. The Dissenters obtained in this manner members of a different description, raised among the middle order of tradesmen, and the lower order of those who live, as it is called, upon their own means. These, when the pulse of their enthusiasm had fallen, became disgusted with the extravagancies of the society which they had joined, and not less justly impatient of its inquisitive discipline : and if a serious sense of religion survived the fever which had spent itself, they chose rather to pass over to the Dissenters than return to the Church which they had forsaken ; partly to escape the reproach of unsteadiness and inconsistency ; partly because a serious tone of manners, the remains of the puritanical character, was preserved among the sectarians; and partly, also, from a clear view of their own worldly interest, . . a sort of clear-sightedness, which, if it be frequently opposed to the spirit of religion, is always compatible* with the profession of it.

- * ‘ That godliness is gain, we all confess ;
 ‘ By the same rule, then, gain is godliness.
 ‘ This weighty truth our holy tradesmen know,
 ‘ As hand in hand their zeal and interest go,
 ‘ Well skill’d the follies of the day to seize,
 ‘ How pious they, while piety can please !
 ‘ A saintly grocer here exclaims aloud,
 ‘ Abstain from Afric’s blood, ye careless crowd !
 ‘ Lo, judgement comes ! terrific thunders roll !
 ‘ Oh, here preserve your sweetmeats and your soul !’
 ‘ There serious footmen advertise for place,
 ‘ Full six feet high, and thriving babes of grace.
 ‘ See sacred toys the tempting panes expose,
 ‘ Christ’s cross and ladder, Sharon’s heavenly rose ;
 ‘ Good milliners proclaim the scarf of faith,
 ‘ Magdalen hoods, and veils of Nazareth ;
 ‘ Psalms and a vein religious surgeons breathe,
 ‘ And ease at once your scruples and your teeth.’

The Reigning Vice, p. 112.

I transcribe, also, an explanatory note from this clever little volume. ‘ There was a little pasteboard toy, called the ladder of matrimony, which used to stand among the gay cento of a drawing-room table. It has been superseded in pious families, by a trifle of similar construction, every step of which marks our mortal progress heavenward on the one side, and hellward on the other.’

SIR THOMAS MORE.

And which is generally found to be warmly and comfortably covered with that cloak.

MONTESINOS.

The fact is curious in the history of trade, and little known, that the practice of travelling about the country to solicit orders for goods, began among the Quakers, as an incidental consequence of the life led by their Errant-Preachers. Indeed, no sooner had nonconformity ceased to be attended with any kind of danger or inconvenience to its professors, than certain advantages were found to result from it. Its members retained their full share of the general benefits of that general society from which they had withdrawn, for the purpose of forming within it a society of their own : for the exclusions which are imposed by the Test Act, affected only an individual here and there, and the benefits of their own association were wholly to themselves. Thus, in all their dealings, a preference is given to persons of their own sect ; whereas the great body of their countrymen, acting upon no such principle, never dream of inquiring into the tenets of those with whom they deal as tradesmen, or whom they employ in other ways. The Dissenter, when he travels about the country, carries with him in his profession of dissent a passport, which is not less useful than Freemasonry is said to be to an Englishman in some parts of the continent. Moreover, they keep themselves, as a body, clear of scandalous or troublesome members, ridding themselves without difficulty of any who prove to be such, by turning them out upon general society.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In this respect they exercise among themselves the sort of wholesome polity which formed a part of the Saxon law, and in which your existing institutions are most defective.

MONTESINOS.

These are solid advantages: and, within their own sphere, they enjoy individually a greater degree of importance than would fall to their share if they belonged to a wider circle. The various offices in which the members are engaged relative to the concerns of the meeting, give them respectability in the eyes of that little public of which they form a part; and, without any such reasons to render him respectable, a man may figure as the Diotrepes of a Meeting, who would have a very different sense of his own dignity if he belonged to the Church. Much worldly wisdom, too, is shown in the organization and management of these bodies, in which the art of guiding and governing men with their own consent has been brought to great perfection. Activity is employed,..zeal has work assigned for it. There is a stir of business among them,.. a perpetual bustle of confederacy. Societies and Branch Societies, Associations, Deputations, Committees, District Meetings, Quarterly and Annual Meetings, Preachers from a distance, Speechifications*, Ladies' Associations, Ladies' Committees,..† so that the spirit never is allowed

* There may be too much of these good things, it seems. A writer in the Evangelist Magazine, (May, 1826, pp. 185-6,) who says, that ninety-nine out of an hundred 'attend the annual meetings of the Societies principally for the purpose of 'legitimate excitement,' complains that 'unquestionably, as 'a matter of fact, a speech of half an hour, or three quarters, 'is a great affliction, when ten or twelve such addresses are to 'be listened to,' and recommends, 'for both physical and moral 'causes, that no public religious meeting should be protracted 'beyond the limit of three hours, or three hours and a half at 'farthest.'

† The Evangelical Magazine for the present month (July, 1827) contains, on its covers, (p. 24,) an excellent advertisement, which may most fitly be presented to the reader in this place.

'A Public Religious Tea and Coffee Party will take place 'on Tuesday, the 24th of July, 1827, at the Eyre Tavern, 'near Lisson Grove, Regent's Park, at five o'clock, in aid of 'the Funds, and with the consent of the Committee of the 'Aged Pilgrim's Friend Society, when the kind attendance of 'the ministers and friends thereto is most respectfully invited.

to sink or slumber for want of excitement. Now, too, every Sect, and every Sub-Sect has its magazine, with portraits (in many of them) of their ministers while they are living, memoirs of them after their death, and an obituary of the lay members, in the manner of the Flos Sanctorum. There is a great deal in all this that is not religion, but it tends to promote the cause of sectarianism. Enthusiasm has 'ample room and verge enough' allowed it. Pride finds its incense there, and Vanity its food.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The Romish Church provides this sort of occupation and amusement for the laity, in fraternities and processions and festivals.

MONTESINOS.

These attractions, which the old Dissenting Sects hold out to the class of which they are almost exclusively composed, Methodism provides for the lower class; and therefore the converts of that description remain in its ranks, unless they become reprobates; or, if they change,

'The Rev. Mr. Leach, of Robert-Street Chapel, will preside. Tickets, Two Shillings each, of Mr. Green, 5, Duke-Street, Manchester-Square; Mr. Carman, 114, Newgate-Street, and Mr. Sparks, 2, Southampton-Street, Strand. After tea select pieces will be sung. The Room will Tea six hundred persons. Carriage-road to the door. No collection made.'

it is only to pass from one of its denominations to another. For Methodism is now old enough to have its schisms as well as its offsets.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Like the Monastic Orders, which were continually subdividing upon some quarrel of reform,.. for the restoration of old observances, or the introduction of new; sometimes for things as nugacious as the colour of a habit, or the shape of a cowl.

MONTESINOS.

The cause of those divisions has uniformly been the same. All the orders were instituted by persons in a high degree of enthusiasm, who thought they never could impose too many privations and discomforts upon themselves and their followers. Their successors naturally endeavoured to relax the rule by which they were bound, and accommodate it as far as possible to their own convenience and ease. But no sooner had they succeeded in this, than some reformer* arose among them, and revived the old spirit

* The Jesuits are the only order in which this struggle between superstition and the spirit of the world has not continually been going on. Among them it has never appeared, because, in forming their constitution, fanaticism was directed by politic heads, as it has ever been in the administration of that insidious society.

with more or less success, under a new association. The divisions among our sectaries, in like manner, originate, for the most part, in the same* sort of temper which gave birth to the sect. In the other bodies it seldom goes farther than to divide a meeting, and this can be done only in places where the sect is numerous and wealthy; but, among the Methodists, its operation has checked the growth of the original society, and may very probably prevent its farther increase. One division was caused by the desire of wresting the government from the hands of a self-elected body of preachers, and giving to lay members a part in it; failing in this attempted change, the promoters set up a new connexion; but its progress has been slow, owing partly to the early death of the leader of the schism, partly to the defection of the ablest man among them, (a person of great ability,) who went over to the old society ; but principally to the grounds of the separation, because they related merely to the management of the body, a question which might raise some temporary interest, but could not support any continuous feeling. The leader of the Ranters started in a more popular cause. Having prevailed upon some colliers, in his own phrase, ‘ fully to set out for heaven,’ one of them promised his associates a whole day’s praying in the open air, and this led to an imitation of the American Camp-Meetings. The Methodist Conference pronounced such meetings to be highly improper in England, whatever they might be in America, condemned them as being productive of considerable mischief, and disclaimed all connexion with the enthusiasts who directed them. They of course then erected their own standard, and their success has been rapid and great : they attract the greater part of those converts who would otherwise join the old society : and as Wesley himself broke loose from the discipline of the Church in which he was ordained, in like manner others, who are in a state of mind similar to that in which he began his memorable career, rebel against the restrictions of established Methodism, and join the more enthusiastic party. Another branch distinguishes itself by the singularity of preaching in tents ; another by employing female preachers.

* ‘ Even in doctrines heretical, there will be super-heresies, and Arians not only divided from the Church, but also among themselves: for heads that are disposed unto schism, and complexionally propense to innovation, are naturally disposed for a community, nor will be ever confined unto the order or economy of one body, and therefore, when they separate from others, they knit but loosely among themselves; nor contented with a general breach or dichotomy with their Church, do subdivide and mince themselves almost into atoms.’—Religio Medici.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Is there no negligence in the shepherds, when so many sheep are to be found astray?

MONTESINOS.

The fault is less imputable there than to the government, which, during more than a century from the time of the Revolution, may be said to have entirely disregarded the state of religion. No provision was made for increasing the means of religious instruction in proportion to the increase of population, nor was any attention paid to the sort of increase which the manufacturing system produces. The Church, even when preferment was bestowed with least regard to desert, and most to personal or political considerations, has never been without its burning and shining lights. It has produced the ablest vindications of natural and revealed religion against those worst enemies of their fellow-kind who have laboured to set aside the evidence for both, .. and of its own primitive faith against its Romish opponents. And though we still sometimes hear of such promotions as are likened* to snow in summer and rain in harvest for their effect upon the public weal, at no time has the church of England been better supplied with dutiful and able ministers than it is now, if, indeed, at any time so well.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Better supplied than at any former time it may be, and yet be supplied but ill. State patronage and lay patronage must always insure in some degree that evil, till statesmen have sufficient integrity, and government sufficient strength, to regard desert alone in the disposal of preferment; and till it be generally understood that the person who presents himself for ordination, or is presented for a benefice, will certainly be rejected, should he be found incompetent, in the first case, or unworthy in the second. 'Take away the dross from the silver, and there shall come forth a vessel for the finer.' But to suppose that this should uniformly and strictly be done, would be supposing a greater improvement in the common feelings and practice of society than is likely soon to be effected in a nation where so many causes of corruption are at work.

MONTESINOS.

And yet a great improvement has been effected within the present generation, in episcopal superintendence, in the disposal of the government patronage, and in the discipline of the universities. It began in the universities, where it was most needed. An increase of the clergy, proportionate to the increase of the people, is still wanting. But the first steps have been taken towards this necessary measure; and something has also been done towards training up a supply of clergy for those remoter parts of the country where the cures are miserably poor, and the peasantry are the only inhabitants. Such cures were held in these northern counties by unordained persons till about the middle of George II.'s reign, when the Bishops came to a resolution, that no one should officiate who was not in orders. But, because there would have been some injustice and some hardship in ejecting the existing incumbents, they were admitted to deacons' orders without undergoing any examination. The person who was then Reader, as it was called, at yonder Chapel, in the Vale of Newlands, and who received this kind of ordination, exercised the various trades of Tailor, Clogger, and Butter-print maker.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Such places were better supplied methinks, when the Convents sent forth itinerant preachers through the country.

MONTESINOS.

Poor, and retired cures, however, are not better supplied with resident ministers in Romish countries at this time. In Scotland young clergymen are stationed upon such cures, with the title of Missionaries, and promoted to benefices elsewhere after some years of probationary service. This arrangement is found, I believe, to answer well in practice: perhaps it might not be equally practicable in England, where a smaller proportion of ecclesiastics is now drawn from humble life, .. which in former times supplied the far greater part of the active, .. or, in the phraseology of the present day, the operative clergy.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Some of the highest preferment in the Church was always bestowed upon persons of high birth, under the old system, though they had little other pretensions to it than what their parentage gave them. There were also not a few who belonged to what may be called the Church dormant; for these the Monastic establishments provided convenient dormitories and ample endowments. Persons of the former class have still the means of securing their full share in the distribution of state patronage, which, however, cannot now be bestowed without some regard to appearances, and some deference to public opinion. Persons of the latter description are thrust into the Church by lay patronage ; more excusably, perhaps, when a fair allowance is made for natural feelings and family claims, but more injuriously to the commonweal ; because such appointments are not within the scope of general observation, and therefore the same regard to qualifications and character is not exacted. Neither the Church nor State have been better served since this class of men, which was formerly disposed of in comfortable abbeys, has been provided for in the ranks of diplomacy, and in public offices, or as parish priests. You tell me, however, that in the Church some check has been placed upon the admission of those whose idle habits, or narrow capacities, disqualify them for even the ordinary business of their profession. So far as this restraint may exist, even if it proceed only from a politic perception, that, assailed as the Church Establishment now is on all sides, its preservation must mainly depend upon the worth and efficiency of its members, it tends to produce a better principle in this important matter, and a better practice, than has heretofore been manifested ; and this may be regarded as a symptom of the best kind of improvement, that which takes place in public opinion. I should have supposed that it would have been more difficult to bring about this improvement, than to find ministers who would be contented to serve the church in its humblest and poorest stations. In a country which sends forth its missionaries to all parts of the globe, and which is actually overflowing with enthusiasm, if the Established Church feel a want of unambitious, unworldly, devout, and devoted men, to engage in its most forlorn service, or perform its most laborious and painful duties, it cannot surely be because such persons are not to be found. The land abounds with them; the very zeal which overruns it like a noxious weed might be rendered wholesome by proper culture, and bring forth good fruit. There must be some defect in ecclesiastical polity where such a want is felt.

MONTESINOS.

There is that defect: no channel has been opened for enthusiasm, . . . using the word in that better sense which it may sometimes bear. The useful ends to which lay zeal might be directed were not perceived in the first age of our Reformation; and indeed, if the same kind of zeal had then existed, and in the same degree, there were no such opportunities for employing it, as the changes, I had almost said the revolutions, of society, have produced. Therefore, no want of foresight can be imputed to the founders of the English Church; neither are their successors deserving of censure on this score, so long as those great struggles continued which agitated the nation for half a century after its convulsions had ceased. But we may indeed look back upon a whole hundred years subsequent to that time, during which not one of the sure and certain developments produced by progressive civilization seems to have been anticipated by statesmen, no measure which indicates prospective policy was taken; nor was the slightest attempt made toward supplying the defects and remedying the evils that exist in our social order, defects and evils which, in every generation, became more apparent and more dangerous. Thus while the husbandman slept, the enemy improved the opportunity and sowed his tares; and the weeds of the soil blossomed and shed their seed.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

‘ I went by the field of the slothful, and by
‘ the vineyard of the man void of understanding;
‘ And lo, it was all grown over with thorns,
‘ and nettles had covered the face thereof, and
‘ the stone wall thereof was broken down.’

MONTESINOS.

Solomon may seem indeed in that picture to have emblemed the state of our Church Establishment during the eighteenth century.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The thorns and the nettles, Montesinos, are still there, flourishing in their strength; the fence which has been broken down is not repaired; and there are still, methinks, among the husbandmen some whose desire is ‘yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep!’

MONTESINOS.

Something of this must always be expected, and allowed for. Both in public and in private life there will ever be those who, for moral cowardice, seek to put off the evil which they are afraid to face, satisfied if the act of exertion, or the day of reckoning can be deferred till their time is over, and reckless of what may happen afterwards. But this grievous sin of omission, in its worst degree, when it arises from mere, unqualified, self-acknowledged selfishness, is more likely to occur in domestic than in national affairs. Some excuse may be found for prelates and statesmen in that love of ease, or, to convey a more favourable, and perhaps a more accurate meaning, that desire of tranquillity, which age brings with it in the course of nature. Nor ought we hastily to condemn them for preferring that expectant system which is generally pursued by the physicians on the continent, and leaving political diseases, whether civil or ecclesiastical, to work out their own cure, or to exhaust themselves, instead of interfering with strong prescriptions, which might possibly prove hurtful rather than remedial. I offer this apology for them under a consciousness that, had I been placed in their station, I should have stood in need of such an excuse myself. That danger itself is the best remedy for danger, is a maxim which has been entered among the *Jacula* Prudentium*: but I can well understand, and, were I in their place, might probably partake the feeling of those in authority, who, in the clear foresight of impending evils, wrapt themselves for consolation in the thought, that, ‘let the world go how it will, we shall have our length and our breadth at last.’

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Then are you bound with deeper gratitude to thank Providence that it has not called you to a state of life in which a heavy responsibility is incurred by timidity and indecision! Interference may often be dangerous, but it is certain also that neglect, not unfrequently, is fatal.

* Collected by George Herbert, and printed with his Remains.

They whose aim, . . and it is the wise and proper aim of statesmen in well ordered communities, . . is to keep things as they are, should bear in mind, that such conservation can only be effected by constant vigilance and care; . . that human affairs never remain stationary, but are always taking their course.

MONTESINOS.

Must we say with Shakspeare, whose course will on,

The way it takes, cracking ten thousand curbs

Of more strong link asunder, than can ever

Appear in our impediment!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Men are but all too prone to find in that reflection an excuse to themselves for their own ineptitude or inertness. The truth is indubitable when applied to human affairs upon the great scale, as directed by omnipotent and omniscient Providence; for upon that scale they are no more within the scope of human control than are the motions of the planets or the spheres. But this awful, though consolatory contemplation, is for faith and hope: they who gird themselves for the business of the world, should go to it with a sense of the utility, the importance, the necessity, and the duty of their exertions.

MONTESINOS.

Our present evils arise more from the excess of that confidence in green heads, than from the want of it in grey ones. Yet, on the whole, the too much and the too little, . . foresight and improvidence, caution and hope, wariness and enterprize, . . yea, even superstition and impiety, serve in their results to balance each other.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Has then the balance been adjusted in those results which the recklessness of the State, and the supineness of the Church, during the last century, produced, or rather suffered to be produced, upon the moral and religious condition of this people?

MONTESINOS.

I mean to say that Providence has taken more care of an ungrateful nation, than that nation has taken for itself; and that a due sense of this awful truth ought to have the effect of keeping us watchful, not of lulling us into supine security. Seeing through what perils we have past, and in what position we now are, our rulers, methinks, should feel like a countryman, who, having fallen asleep in his cart, finds himself when he awakes upon the edge of a precipice, towards which the wheels are approaching.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Two manifestations of the course of Providence have often been pointed out as the most distinct and prominent which have yet occurred in the history of the human race. The coming of our Lord and Saviour is one, at that precise time when the world, in its moral and political circumstances, was best fitted for the reception and diffusion of the Gospel; the other, far indeed inferior in moment to that paramount event, but inferior to it alone, is the discovery of printing, just when the Gospel itself was to be raised as it were from the dead. Looking at the present crisis of the world, have you not perceived that in like manner certain mighty agencies, hitherto unknown or unapplied, have been now first brought into action, when the necessity for their development becomes apparent?

MONTESINOS.

Such a train of reflections, and the belief which it confirms, could alone prevent me from regarding as sure forebodings the mournful thoughts that a clear perception of the present evils of society, and of those which are pressing upon it in dreadful sequence, too frequently, and too naturally, call forth. We were led to observe, in discoursing upon the changes which the Art of War has undergone, that, though the application of gunpowder to that art was foreseen and expected by Roger Bacon, it was not brought into full employ, even after its composition and its uses were generally known, till the time had come when its introduction tended to diminish rather than to aggravate the horrors of a state of warfare. This observation alone, were there no other ground for such a tenet, might lead us to infer, that the power of steam has not been called into action, and placed under human control, till society had reached that stage in its progress wherein more good than evil would result from the discovery. It is worthy of especial remark, and more especial gratitude, that if steam ships had been rendered manageable only ten years earlier, . . nay, even a less time, . . our deadly struggle with Buonaparte must have been decided upon our own soil; and in that case London might easily have shared the same fate as Moscow, though the invaders would assuredly have suffered as dreadful a catastrophe in this island from the arm of man, as was inflicted upon them in their flight from Russia by the ministering elements. Obvious as the application of steam to such a purpose may seem to have been, and common as it already has become in these few intervening years, the discovery was withheld till it could no longer be made instrumental to so great an evil; no sooner had that danger been averted than it came into use, rendering the great rivers of South America accessible to commerce and civilization just as the political revolution is effected there, which,..whatever may be its other consequences,..has opened those countries to the improvements which thus, and only thus, can be brought about. When I look to moral agencies, equally influential, but in a wider and more important sphere, I recognize and admire the same merciful adaptation of means to their intended effect. In the social, as in the human system, new powers are called into action as they are needed,..new functions develop themselves according to its growth. Schemes for general education are extensively promoted, and means for facilitating it, beyond all former example, have been devised in this age, when the rapid increase of the labouring classes renders education, as a corrective and conservative, not merely desirable for the well-being of society, but absolutely needful for the existence of our institutions and of social order itself, which otherwise would, ere long, inevitably be destroyed. Thus, too, when Popery is spreading itself over the face of the land, for so its advocates and propagandists boastingly proclaim; when, in their own words*, it is 'taking its hereditary attitude,' which is, being interpreted, advancing its old claims, and struggling to recover its old ascendancy and dominion; a zeal for the Scriptures, such as no former times have witnessed, hath arisen; and the same feeling, by which our fathers were delivered from the tyranny and more intolerable impostures of the Romish Church, is manifesting itself anew to uphold the religious freedom which we have inherited, and to extend the privileges and the blessings of that freedom unto the people who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death. In one of our first conversations†, Sir Thomas, you gave that zeal the name of bibliolatry; I admit that to such an excess it may in some instances have been carried: I admit that weakness, rashness, enthusiasm, fanaticism, have been brought by it into action and into full display: that Zanies and Pharisees have played their part in the exhibition, and that Simplicity and Truth may have been seen there arm-in-arm with Hypocrisy and Craft. But in all great movements there has ever been this mixture of men and motives ; and with all drawbacks for this, all allowances for misdirected and wasted exertions, certain it is that there has been a great and good object in view, and that a mighty and a holy work is in progress.

* I take them from a Stonyhurst publication, entitled 'Protestantism calmly considered,' as quoted in a newspaper. The Jesuits of that establishment there tell us, that their religion 'is again spreading itself over the face of the land; it has been kept down by a series of intolerant laws, and almost extinguished by the bloody persecutions of Protestant kings; but 'it is again taking its hereditary attitude, supported by Him who promised that the gates of hell should not prevail against it.'

SIR THOMAS MORE.

The Church of England, Montesinos, has yet to learn one lesson from its enemies, . . how to marshal and direct that enthusiasm, which no system, however wise or however despotic, can suppress, and which, if it be not enlisted in its service, is sure to be actively engaged against it.

MONTESINOS.

The art of directing enthusiasm into channels where it may either be usefully employed, or spend itself harmlessly, is the most difficult which the Machiavellists of Papal Rome have ever been called upon to practise.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Yet they succeeded in it.

MONTESINOS.

Only to a certain extent : for what is the history of all the heresies in the Romish Church, the schisms that have shaken, and the opinions which at this day, notwithstanding its vainly boasted unity, divide it, but the register of their failures? And when they succeeded, methinks the sincere Romanist, who has not proscribed to himself all use of reason, must wish in his secret heart that the Romish Church had rather dispensed with the temporary service, however great, of knaves, and fools, and madmen, than have taken to itself the load of infamy which has thus been brought upon it. Mad as James Nailor was, and blasphemous as was the character of his madness, I cannot read of his punishment without feeling something like the shame and sorrow we partake in a national disgrace. Yet how much better is it, even for the national credit, (all consequences apart,) that this poor fanatic should have suffered the sentence which makes him an object of compassion whenever his name is remembered, (even to those by whom his most edifying repentance is unknown,) than that he should have been, as others under a like delusion were, exhibited with the stigmata, . . . that advantage should have been taken of his insanity to render him the accomplice or the victim of an impious conspiracy, . . . and that after his death he should have been canonized for a new object of idolatrous worship!

SIR THOMAS MORE.

But, without passing the bounds of strictest probity and prudence, do you not think that the rulers of the Church might have sanctioned Wesley and Whitefield in their extraordinary ministry, and that the Methodists might thus have been retained within the pale of the Establishment?

MONTESINOS.

No fear of misrepresentation, or of obloquy, shall ever deter me from declaring my belief that Wesley and Whitefield were chosen instruments of Providence, for giving a great impulse to religious feeling when it was needed most. But I do not think that the Bishops could conscientiously, or prudently, have sanctioned their proceedings at any stage of their career, . . . certainly not at first, when they gave way to and encouraged extravagances, which Wesley, after age and experience had sobered him, heartily condemned. A re-union with the Methodists since his death may seem to have been much more practicable than a comprehension of the Dissenters ever was; but there is a remark of Lord Strafford's to be borne in mind, who warns us, 'how advised we ought to be of any innovation, considering that inconveniences are rather found by experience, than foreseen by ‘judgement.’ Yet, bearing the warning of this great statesman in mind, I am nevertheless of opinion, that it is possible at this time, not indeed to bring the Methodists back to the Establishment from which they have erred and strayed, but to employ methodism in aid of the Establishment, and embody as Church-Methodists those who would otherwise be drawn in to join one or other of the numerous squadrons of dissent.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

In this way, if I apprehend your meaning, they might be to the Church of England what its various fraternities are to the Church of Rome.

MONTESINOS.

The good that is connected with those fraternities might be attained, free from the superstitious and idolatrous practices upon which they are, for the most part, founded. There would be that segregation from the community into particular societies which gratifies at once the social and the selfish feeling, and which is one of the strong attractions that Sectarianism holds out. There would be that employment afforded for which certain dispositions are continually craving, . . . that sympathy for devotional tempers which it is so dangerous to inflame, and yet so injurious to extinguish. But, what is more pertinent to our immediate topic, volunteers would thus be found to take upon themselves some of those duties which, in large towns and thickly-peopled districts, it is impossible for the parochial clergy to perform.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Could the difficulty which you have noticed, of providing fit ministers for poor and lonely places, be thus removed?

MONTESINOS.

That object can be effected no otherwise than by raising the income of the poorest benefice till it is sufficient to render the incumbent respectable, as to worldly circumstances, in the eyes of his parishioners.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Is it likely that such a description of Methodists could be raised; and, if raised, is it probable that they could be kept together, and restrained from extravagances such as those into which you have truly observed both Whitefield and the Wesleys fell?

MONTESINOS.

There are at this time men willing to make the attempt, and qualified for what they would undertake. They propose, not to take upon themselves any of the ministerial functions, not to consider their body as an independent sect, nor their preachers as independent ministers ; but to act simply as a religious society, united in dutiful obedience to the Establishment, professing its tenets, and endeavouring to promote, by precept and example, the knowledge and practice of true Christian piety. To secure the continuance of that union with the National Church, which is the principle of their association, they agree to insert a provision in the title deeds of every Chapel, that if the sacrament should ever be administered there, or the Chapel opened for worship in canonical hours, when there is service in the parish Church, the Chapel should thereby be escheated, and become the property of the Crown. Thus, they say, they should act in conformity with the principles which Wesley professed first and last ; thus should they obey the counsels which Wesley gave in the last year of his life, when, repeating his declaration, that he lived and died a member of the Church of England, he added, ‘ that none, who regarded his judgment or advice, ‘ would ever separate from it ; and thus, should ‘ they fulfil his prediction, that whenever his ‘ followers should divide into Dissenting-Me- ‘ thodists and Church-Methodists, the latter ‘ would carry on his primitive design with more ‘ success than ever ; the former,’ he said, ‘ would dwindle into a dry, dull, separate sect.’ There is, therefore, good reason to suppose that a body of Church-Methodists might be raised, and that, if raised, they might be kept together. Whether it would be possible to guard effectually against those extravagances, into which weak minds and strong feelings are easily hurried, is a question to be more doubtfully answered. Love-feasts, which give occasion for scandal, and watch-nights, which afford opportunity for what is scandalous, would, the first probably, the last certainly, be disused ; and so must the abominable practice of mutual examination and confession in the band-meetings.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

What do they ask from the National Church in furtherance of their design ?

MONTESINOS.

Countenance from its dignitaries ; and to have their services accepted by the parochial clergy, as they are offered, in good will.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

Will they obtain this ?

MONTESINOS.

There are many obstacles, and of a kind which are not easily removed ; strong prejudices in some, amounting to a settled dislike ; timidity in others, who would be willing to see the attempt made, and glad that it should succeed, but who shrink from the responsibility of affording it any direct encouragement. Many will be of opinion that nothing, with the name and semblance of Methodism, can be propagated, without leading to some such follies and excesses as have generally accompanied it. Many, again, may apprehend, that more formalism than faith would be produced, a pharisaic demeanour*, and an uncharitable spirit, rather than a Christian temper. And many, who have not these fears, may be withheld from giving any approbation to such an attempt, by their persuasion that our Church has provided all that is necessary for the instruction, the exercise, and the consolation of its members; and therefore they are contented, according to the old monk's rule, sinere res vadere sicut evadunt.

SIR THOMAS MORE.

There may, indeed, seem reason for apprehending that the new wheat which the husbandmen, whom you are for admitting into the field, would sow, would be in the proportion of a few grains to a handful of tares; at any rate, the field would stand in need of constant and careful weeding ! But they who suppose that the ecclesiastical Establishment, in its present state, is competent to the duties expected from it, must have overlooked the great increase of population, for which no provision has been made, and the fearful changes of society, which, even more than that increase, render the corrective and conservative powers of religion above all things necessary. For that, and that alone, can preserve the social body from putrescence and dissolution.

* 'For aught I see,' says South, 'though the Mosaical part of Judaism be abolished among Christians, the Pharisaical part of it never will.—Vol. i. p. 65.
